COLUMN FOR THE CURIOUS.

GUNPOWDER is a topic of the day, so that the return to squibs and crackers on the 5th of November excites little notice. The sale of fireworks was formerly punishable by fine; now it is licensed by justices in petty sessions under the "Gunpowder Act Amendment." The Act of towns was, accordingly, unusually rife with senseless bangs on Saturday last, much to the annoyance of elderly and nervous people. Could we get rid of the Prayer Book observance of the day, which may be progress; then why go back to the gunpowder observance or amend a law to regulate the use of it? Under the old Act every house in town was covered with gunpowder, and the old Act contained a clause which is a different matter to licensing shopkeepers to sell fireworks to be thrown about the streets. After all, fireworks are a senseless waste of money, for "those less in a madman will throw about fire." A far better observance of the 5th of November is as the memory of the old Battle of Inkerman, which belongs also to the gunpowder calendar.

The Grocers' Company proposes to rebuild their hall in Princes-street, near the Bank. The Grocers met at various town mansions and hotels before they had a hall of their own. Their hall in 1428, in Conuingshop-lane, in the Poultry. The roof and woodwork of this hall were only destroyed in the Great Fire of 1666; it was renovated in 1681 by Sir John Moore, who was Lord Mayor in 1681-2, and was lost for the same object till 1735. The Bank of England held their courts here from 1694 till 1734; from the first, the hall was let "for dinners, funerals, county feasts, and weddings." The City dinners to the Long Parliament were given here; Cromwell and Fairfax were feasted here by the Grocers; and, at the Restoration, General Monk. The present hall was built upon the ancient site sixty-two years since; and, when the Company parted with it, they had their name for changing Prince's-street, for this slice, which cost the Grocers £31 17s. 8d. in 1833, they opened the Bank of England to receive more than £20,000. The hall was thoroughly repaired in 1837, when the garden front was enriched with the arms of the company—on each side the great crest, and a bordered panel, enclosing the corporate observance of the grocers' commodities. The hall is spacious, and has a music gallery; the Grocers' Company have a choir of their orchestra.

Talking of new halls, the elegant stone front of Saddlers' Hall, in Cheapside, has just been completed; it is a narrow elevation, but, in point of taste and material, much in advance of the old frontage.

The Scotch have discovered the geological formation of a basin that Sir William Logan has just placed in the Museum of Practical Geology a large specimen. The basin has been found in the interlaminated limestone beds of the Laurentian system at Grenville, containing the oldest known organic remains. The minute structure is only visible when a thin transparent slice of the stony substance the specimen.

In the Gentleman we find recorded the discovery of "the remains of an ancient British town" on the western side of Craigie-hill, near Edinburgh, and about 400 feet above the sea level. Several stone coffins were exhumed a few months since, on the Laichthrope side of the Almond River. Mr. Hutchinson, of Carlowrie, has examined the hill; and his men, in digging, have come upon traces of walls, of vitrified, or ramparts, inclosing a space near the western top of the hill, upon which were various circular rings of stones, probably marking the foundations of such dwellings as 'our rude forefathers' are known to have occupied.' Next day, in a more systematic search, were exposed portions of the lines of the circles of walls, and one of the outer raised circles inside; also a gate which had formed one of the entrances to the encampment. A well, constructed of stones found in a deep ravine, as parallels, and towards that part of the hill from which alone any attack could be made, and the first preventing approach from harriers, which, in those times, no invading force could have overcome."

Southwark Bridge was opened toll-free by the Lord Mayor on Tuesday, thus ending the elected object of Alderman Copeland's mayoralty. We need not here detail the agreement of the Bridge Company with the City authorities, by which the cost of the enterprise money named is £200,000, or one quarter of the original cost of the bridge, including the approaches. The works were commenced in 1815, and the bridge was opened to the public, March 24, 1819, as the clock of St. Paul's Cathedral tolled midnight. The ironwork (5700 tons weight) had been cast together by the Walkers, of Rotherhithe, and the founders, and the masonry by the contractors, Lolfe and Banks, that when they had completed nearly one sinking was discernible in the arches. From experiments made to ascertain the expansion and contraction between the extreme range of winter and summer temperature it was found that the arch rose in summer about 1 in. to 1½ in. The purchase of this bridge and throwing it open to public use was first agitated in 1857; and in 1861 the compulsory bill for the bridge and its appurtenances £300,000, which the Corporation declined. Mr. Bennoch, in his well-written pamphlet, published in 1853, states that the Bridge of Sighs at Venice, and the bridge of the fourth of that of Waterloo: be very properly points to the gradients on the City side of Southwark-bridge, which are 1 in 20, and 1 in 30 respectively, in general, the add of an extra tower to pull an ordinary waggon up the incline. To remedy this, it is proposed, as we have said, to lift the bridge to a level bridge of the proper height, and in a line with St. Paul's, Cathedral, opening up that noble structure in a manner hitherto unrealised, with approaches, and the bridge continued, and that at least 60 ft. wide, running direct to the Elephant and Castle, then which a grander opening there could not be. The bridge would not be found much more costly than when it was proposed by Mr. Bennoch, in 1853.

An interesting paper on the discoveries in Essex, which we announced in our Column of the 22nd ult., was read to the Archæological Institute at Colchester, and considered in the absence of Mr. Parnell, the secretary; extracts from a report by Mr. Spurrell; and some observations on the subject by Mr. Roach Smith. The general conclusion is that the site of Othona has been determined, and is marked by the Roman remains to which we have already alluded. The Achilea nasuta (yarrow) grows in the fields around the Saxon shore; of these eight had been already identified, and we have now to add the ninth. The walls of the camp are described at the meeting, it seems probable that the walls exposed at St. Peters Head were erected subsequent to other buildings in the neighbourhood, which have been excavated. The portions of the walls already excavated consist of a piece about 20 ft. long and 8 ft. high. The examination of the walls has led to double other pieces, which appear to have formed part of the incidence of a square, and which the Romans established at Burgh-on-the-Wall, now used as a barn, probably occupies the centre. Specimens of Samian and Caistor ware, picked up out of innumerable fragments, are exhibited. Coins, ranging, as far as hens coins of the Constantine family. Numerous skeletons have been found, but no urns, which is said to be the general interment. It should be added that the actual discovery of Roman remains only within the last year, and has been a labour of love suggested in the Ordnance Map long ago. To the engineer, Mr. G. W. Hemans, great credit is due for his courtesy in directing the attention of the institute to this subject, and for his affectionate devotion on an opportunity of throwing a light upon a somewhat obscure chapter in history.

The recurrence of the vintage season has brought out the Moniteur Vinicole this history and mystery of "Imperial Tokay"—

The vintage of Tokay, which is reputed to have been first planted in Hungary on the top of a hill near the meeting of the Bodrog with the Theiss. The soil, which is composed of a volcanic tufa, and the vines, which are double, of which the one on which the grapes rest is pierced with small holes. The vat is filled with grapes carefully separated from the stalks, and the grapes become heated to boiling, fulminant, and fermentation sets in. The fermentation endures the fantastic add, and the weight of the grapes forces the juice through the holes in the bottom. The grapes are then trodden under foot, and the wine is poured into small casks, where it remains exposed to the air for a month, after having fermented for two days. This is the wine which is generally exported. Wines of good quality it has a savoury, oily odour, the taste sweet and mellow with a peculiar earthy flavour, slightly astringent and aromatic, all of which are lost by exposure to the air during a very indefinite period, but it is not drinkable until it is three years old. The ordinary quality of wine is sold by the Hungarian peasants for wine from 5s. to 6s. the hectre. The Emperor of Russia keeps a commission agent at Tokay who purchases every or fifty casks of the best of the every year.

THE FURNISHING of BED-ROOMS.
HEAL and SON have devoted much attention to the subject of Bed-room Furniture, and it would be advantageous to their customers to see a much larger Stock than it is possible to show in a small space. They have, therefore, arranged a Separate Show-room, in which they are enabled to display a Stock of Bedsteads, Bedding, Mattresses, Blankets, Quilts, and Bed-room Furniture, beyond what they believe has ever been submitted to the public, and which comprises every article, in the manufacture of which they have been long celebrated, in the most approved styles.
Separate Bed Goods may be seen in complete suites of five or six different colours, some of them light and ornamental, and others of a more massive character, suitable for Servants' Bed-rooms, Night Nurseries, Bed Club, and Hotels, and for Furnishing Lodging-houses, where customers are able to see the effect as it would appear in their own rooms. A Suite of every description of Bed-room Furniture will gladly be kept in stock, and from time to time new and select furniture will be added to the Show-room.
Bed Furniture may be had in Silk, Reps, Damasks, &c., large enough that a complete assortment may be seen and the effect of any particular pattern ascertained, as it would appear in a Bed-room.
A very large stock of Bedding (Heal and Son's original trade) to be seen in the Show-room.
The Stock of Bedding and Bed-room Furniture, and the Plan of Separate Goods for given bed-rooms' use, is very greatly increased, and the entire stock is now arranged in Show-rooms (Nos. 196, 197, 198, 199), and two large ground floor—the whole forming as complete an assortment of Bed-room Furniture generally as can possibly be gathered together.
Every attention is paid to the manufacture of the Cabinet-work, and they have a large number of Bedsteads always ready for this purpose, that the manufacturer may be under their own immediate inspection.
Their Bedding is principally made in their own workshops, every article being made on the premises.
They particularly call attention to their Patent Spring Mattress, the Somnier Elastique Portatif. It is portable, durable, and elastic, and is recommended for its cleanliness and comfort.

THE
awarded to any English Manufacturers of CHOCOLATE AND COCOA, was GIVEN to J. S. FRY and SONS, Bristol and London.

FRY'S ICELAND MOSS COCOA.
A combination of Cocoa with Iceland Moss
Very strengthening and nutritious, delicate, and agreeable for the general consumer.

BREAKFAST BEVERAGE.—Homœopathic Cocoa.—Invalids and others requiring pure, easily, recommended COCOA as being the most healthful of all beverages. When the doctrine of homœopathy was first introduced into this country there were to be obtained no preparations of cocoa either attractive to the eye or pleasant to the palate, and the consequence was that it was either used in its crude state or so much adulterated as to render it quite useless. J. EPPS, of London, Homœopathic Chymist, was the first, in the year 1839, to call the attention to this subject, and at length succeeded, with the assistance of chemistry machinery, in producing a Cocoa which, while it retains all the nutritive properties of the seed, is rendered so thin that it will pass through the stomach in a few hours, and is at the same time so much prepared as to be most acceptable to the delicate stomach.

EPPS'S HOMŒOPATHIC COCOA is highly recommended as a most delicious and healthful Breakfast Beverage, with a delicious aroma. Dr. Hassall, in his work, "Food and its Adulterations," says: "Cocoa is a great variety of important nutritious principles; every ingredient necessary to the healthful support of the body is found in it in the most perfect proportion. Epps's Homœopathic Cocoa is sold by Grocers, Chemists, &c., in packets and tins, with full Directions—Two teaspoonfuls of the powder in a breakfast-cup, filled up with boiling water. Sold in packets at 1s. 6d., 2s., 2s. 6d., and 3s. packets, labelled "J. Epps, Homœopathic Chemist, London." Also in tins for abroad, 1 lb., 2 lb., and 5 lb. each. Manufactory, Euston-road, London." Sold by Grocers, Chemists, and Chemists."

THE ITALIAN PARLIAMENT.

THEY whose sympathies are in favour of the national unity of Italy—a disposition which may safely be attributed to the great majority of Englishmen—will have followed the course of the great debate in the Italian Parliament on the transfer of the capital with an anxiety of interest as intense as any excited by far more romantic events. In prospect, it might reasonably, and without any lack of generous appreciation, have been doubted whether the policy to which the Government of Victor Emanuel was committed by the Franco-Italian Convention, even if the very best which the present state of affairs in Europe would admit of, would conciliate the several provincial interests, or neutralise the passionate desire of the whole people to make Rome the centre of the new kingdom. The experiment appealed to just those qualities of character the most likely to give way under the strain of so severe a test; and how decidedly soever far-seeing statesmanship might approve, it was nevertheless one which appeared to cut right athwart the most fondly-cherished aspirations of the people. Political sagacity and complete self-mastery—the rarest of popular characteristics—were the twin elements upon the preponderance of which the success of the policy would mainly depend. When, therefore, the initiative steps to the promulgation of it were found to have been so signally mismanaged as to have occasioned serious bloodshed in Turin and the sudden downfall of the Ministry, it need hardly awaken surprise that the most sanguine friends of Italy, here and elsewhere, looked forward to a general election and to the consequent tenour of Parliamentary discussion with fear and trembling. The question to be determined was of a kind that might well have shaken to its base an old Constitutional kingdom; how, then, it was tacitly asked, will Italy, but recently endowed with the privileges and bound by the restraints of Constitutional rule, pass through so searching an ordeal?

Thus far, people and Parliament have dealt with the matter before them with an intelligence and self-restraint which cannot fail of exciting the highest admiration. To the astonishment of Europe, the keen political instincts of the Italians almost instantly detected the ultimate advantages to Italy which lay hidden beneath the articles of the Convention, and held themselves prepared, in the event of their first impressions being confirmed by subsequent information and reflection, to submit to the temporary sacrifices the demand for which was visible enough upon the surface. They appear, so far as the materials for judgment are before us, to apprehend what is probably the real object of the agreement with France; they even feel the force of that necessity which compels the Government of General Della Marmora to observe a discreet reticence in reference to the results which may be expected to flow from its provisions when they shall have fairly taken effect; and they evince an unexpected aptitude to postpone present dreams with a view to future realities. It would be premature, no doubt, to build confident conclusions upon existing premises. It is easier to assent to a policy which bids us wait until its fruit has ripened than to resist whatever temptations may present themselves to deviate from it. But even the readiness to assent, whatever may come of it, indicates a high stage of political progress, and justifies the friends of Italy in affirming that she is competent to turn to good account whatever legitimate gains the public opinion of Europe will admit of her acquiring.

As the discussion has proceeded, the indications have become more numerous and distinct that the Convention is nothing more than a practical recognition by the two Powers of the real difficulties which at present surround the Roman question, and a mutual agreement to leave the final adjustment of it to be brought about by the exclusive force of moral agencies. Lady Bloomfield herself not to attempt what France would feel herself under an imperative obligation to prevent; and, on the other hand, France engages, within a definite time, to withdraw from the Government of Rome that material support which enables it to set at nought every consideration of sound policy which might otherwise shape its decisions. The solution of the problem will depend, and is probably meant by both the contracting Powers to depend, upon the natural and inherent vitality or the essential rottenness, as the event may prove, of the temporal sovereignty of the Supreme Pontiff. Non-intervention becomes available as in support of the future maintenance of the rule of the Vatican, is the kernel of the Franco-Italian Convention; if it can stand by its own strength it shall stand; if it must fall because of its own weakness, it must fall; but neither in its stability nor its collapse to be aided by external force or intrigue. Italy gives her pledge that she will try the experiment fairly by transferring her capital to Florence; France, by gradually recalling her troops from Rome. Both reserve to themselves the right to act in conformity with their own judgment in case of a serious insurrection within the Papal dominions. The ends to be answered by this agreement are, first, that the Emperor will have so far consulted popular opinion in France as to enable him to extricate his Government from an embarrassing and expensive obligation; secondly, that Italy will be held to hold not to allow of any trespass upon the Roman territory from without; and, thirdly, a possibility of some peaceful arrangement hereafter by which the dignity of the Holy See shall be permanently secured, and the estates allotted to the Church by Charlemagne shall be politically incorporated in the kingdom of Italy.

Perchance there may be some foundation for the rumour that the Emperor Napoleon intends the settlement, for the present at least, of the Roman question, to pave the way for larger designs. There can be little doubt that he is seriously intent upon having about him, if possible, a considerable reduction of armaments in Europe. The two main obstacles to success in such an enterprise have been Rome and Venice. So far as a resort to arms is concerned, Rome, by virtue of the Convention, ceases to be a menace. What if Austria can be induced to dispose of her pretensions to Venetia? What if, after all, and by quiet diplomacy, the Government of the Emperor of Austria should be won over to assent to the principle of giving up her Italian territory for an equivalent possession. A European congress may then become practicable, the disarming within reasonable hope, and the irritation and uncertainty of Europe so far removed as to admit of a partial and proportionate disarmament by the great Powers. Glimpses of some such policy have occasionally, albeit dimly, disclosed themselves in the great Italian debate, and each time they more influential than they would confess to ever the minds of Italian statesmen.

The Chamber of Deputies at Turin, a constitutional body, which, in respect of years, has hardly yet outgrown its childhood, is nevertheless experienced in self-command. It has met many a tumultuous crisis with dignity, but none more becomingly than that which imposes upon it the duty of accepting as its capital another city than that of Rome. The debate, which will probably close with the week, has been remarkable both in its intellectual and its moral aspects. There has been no lack, throughout its progress of Parliamentary ability—if we are to credit the Stronza, there has been a plethora—no dearth of oratory which, in the absence of due intervals of repose, is fatiguing. Adverting to General Della Marmora's speech, which reminds one, by its simple diction and calm, deep sincerity, of the late Duke of Wellington's speeches on great occasions in the House of Lords, the Stronza says that "all such subtle reasonings, such sonorous phrases, such an elegant choice of words, and such a fatiguing force of expressions, which glitter, sparkle, and sting, it was agreeable to hear the parliamentary language of Piedmont speaks as his heart dictates, and expresses his feelings with the same frankness and suggest themselves to him." The criticism is cutting, but might be used of any great debate, in any part of the world in which brilliant intellectual display is brought into contrast with common-place moral worth; and certainly, as the criticism implies, the phases of intellectual life and activity which the Italian debate has reflected have been many, varied, and of full colour; not by any means unworthy of comparison with those brought out by an important struggle of Parliamentary parties in this country. There is a wide difference, no doubt, between the styles and methods of the two nations in transacting their legislative affairs; but we cannot resist the conviction that Italians are "to the manner born," and that their cultivated men naturally possess the qualities essential to orators and statesmen.

The moral features of the debate, however, far outshine the intellectual, and are, we firmly believe, more truly representative of the national mind. The old General disclosed to Europe a striking and most encouraging proof when, after admitting that he had been opposed to the Convention at first, he could throw an apple of discord among the people, he said—"The Italian provinces are more united than might be inferred from the aspect and discussions of this Chamber—they are more united than the deputies themselves." Well, if this be so, the moderation of the Chamber does not exaggerate the calm approval felt by the people. It is a wonderful exhibition of national self-possession under disappointment, or, rather, hope deferred; and we entertain but little doubt that the Italian Parliament will give a final decision on the matter before them worthy of the intelligence and patriotism of the Italian people.

THE DESTRUCTIVE HURRICANE AT CALCUTTA.

The Illustration on our front page may help to give some notion of the scene of devastation on the banks of the River Hooghly at Calcutta, immediately after the tremendous storm of Wednesday, the 5th of October. Our Engraving is copied from a photographic View taken by Mr. F. Fisk Wilson, at Fisk Villa, on the surrounding land. It appears that the weather on Tuesday, the 4th, was showery, with light and variable winds, and occasionally with some lightning; but it was not till an hour after midnight that the barometer began to fall, the wind being then light from the N.E. In the morning the wind gradually freshened, with squalls and rain, till about ten o'clock, when it veered to the east and blew with increased fury. Between eleven and twelve o'clock, the wind having a southerly direction, it became evident that a true cyclone or revolving storm, to which the site of Calcutta is peculiarly exposed, was about to visit that city, yet with more terrific violence than ever before. With a noise like distant thunder it came on in two or three waves, tearing up more than two thousand living off the roots of the houses, overturning walls and buildings, and heaping the streets with ruins. The Esplanade was strewn with trees, where neither foot nor carriage passengers could make their way. This continued for two or three hours, by which time the eastern and southern suburbs of the city, and those parts of it to the westward which, from their proximity to the Maidan and the river, were the most exposed, were more or less, a wreck. Many of the mansions and other palaces, even a tree was anywhere to be found standing. The beautiful avenues in Fort William were entirely destroyed, and the Eden gardens turned into a wilderness. In Tank-square the trees were also blown away, and in many parts the iron railings torn up and overthrown. The damage done to buildings was considerable. The roof of the Free School was blown away; the upper part of the Presbyterian Church in De Sa's-lane was unroofed, and, as well as the steeple of the Free Church of Scotland; the minarets of the Mosque in Dhurrumtolah were all blown away; St. James's Theatre was unroofed and nearly destroyed; the roof of Government House was much damaged; the sheds of the East Indian Railway Company were unroofed. In fact, scarcely a house in Calcutta escaped without injury, while the native huts, especially in the suburbs, were almost all blown down. But it was on the river that the storm was attended by the most disastrous consequences. It should be observed that the gale did not attain its greatest fury until it had passed Kedgeree, which it did very gradually to the south. Whilst blowing from the east, and therefore across the stream, the vessels were kept down by the wind, and the expansion of the river was not great; but when the wind set due south its violence was so greatly aggravated by the billowy state into which the river was lashed. All moorings parted at the height of the storm, and little damage pervious to this crisis in the storm, but as soon as it occurred they commenced rapidly to fill up down. It was a full spring tide, and when this change in the direction of the wind took place the waves encroached on the strand, and at last covered it with a roaring cataract, which bore along everything that was movable—mats, chests, and fragments of wreck. In the port of Calcutta the final moorings were let go, and the consequences of the gale reached its zenith. The river, and the cyclone, from the point from which it came, caught the vessels at their broadside on, its violence was such as no moorings or tackle could resist. The latter first parted, and then adrift, in most cases taking moorings, buoys, and tackle with them, and drifting rapidly in different directions. Vessels fouled together, and carrying with them ships at anchor in the stream, and in many instances dragging their anchors. Confusion went down, and nearly all the others drifted on to the opposite bank of the river, generally taking a course up the river under the influence of the wind at S.S.E. and a strong tide flood, many of them having travelled as far as six or seven miles from their moorings. Such was the disaster, that 1867 ships were reported as having preceded the high, and all the vessels driven to leeward on the opposite bank were more or less damaged by the storm, the rest having been stranded or sunk. Of these many were loaded with grain for Bombay. The amount of confusion, and the number of vessels, while the gale drove this multitude of vessels up the river, can scarcely be described. The steamer Thunderer, the Peninsular and Oriental Company's steamer Delhi, and the Sarah and Ann, Admiral Casey, were fairly lifted up and deposited on shore. Other ships met with a similar fate: the Lady Grenville, of 1200 tons, sank early in the afternoon; but her crew were saved in boats. The Sophia Sophia, of 1857 tons burden, was torn from anchorage and cut to the water-edge. She sank almost instantaneously. The captain and crew were seen clinging to the topmasts yet standing above the water. The Lady Grenville sank with her crew on board, while the gale drove this multitude of vessels up the river, can scarcely be described. The captain and crew were seen clinging to the topmasts yet standing above the water. The Lady Grenville sank with her crew on board, besides there drowned in the multitude of small native boats, which were overwhelmed with the tremendous waves. The loss of life on land and ashore of Calcutta has been ascertained to be forty-one natives and two Europeans, but it would be impossible to ascertain the loss of life at sea. A lamentable amount of distress has been caused by the rise in the prices of all articles of food, which has compelled great numbers of the poor to be reduced to despair by the heavy gales which succeeded the gale, and which is most injurious to health. The total destruction of the crops of rice and the spoiled stocks of the natives to exposure to all sorts of weather; and this, combined with the wet weather which has followed the storm, is likely to produce diseases which will sweep hundreds into the grave. A meeting was held at the Calcutta Chamber of Commerce on the 13th ult. to raise a subscription for the relief of the sufferers. It is hoped and expected that the Bengal Government will do something for them.

The following epitaph may be seen in the cemetery of a parish in the county of Kent, not a hundred miles from Canterbury, a master blacksmith. The railing around this tomb was manufactured by his apprentices, and is, we believe, still standing:—

The annual conference of the Northern Union of Methodist Reformers, which has been holding its sittings in the large chapel at Blaydon-on-the-Tyne, Mr. Joseph Cowen, esq., the chairman of the three days' Conference, presided; and from the annual report of the state of the union, Mr. Joseph Cowen, jun., it appears that there are seventy-seven institutions in the union, containing 7,000 members and 1,000 probationary members. There societies had last year an aggregate income of £7,893, and an aggregate expenditure of £6,624. The total number of Sunday scholars in the circuits is 6,911. In the reading-rooms there are taken in 153 daily and 149 weekly papers, and 1,000 periodicals. Connected with the institutions possess rooms of their own, nineteen rent rooms, and forty-three are allowed to them by owners of the different collieries or manufactories. There are forty-three classes and two night schools in connection with seventeen institutions. Sixty institutions, however, have no other classes nor evening schools in connection with them. There was a very large attendance of delegates at the conference, and discussions arose upon various important subjects connected with the progress of education in the north. It appears from the returns that most of the methodist institutions in the north are in a prosperous condition; but attempts are being made to popularise them by introducing amongst them more secular studies. At the conference held on the evening Sir Hodgson Williamson, M.P., the Sheriff of Newcastle, Mr. W. L. Hardy, and Mr. J. G. Lovell, received gentlemen speaks.

FRANCE.

The Empress's Saint's Day, on Tuesday, was marked by illuminations at the metropolitan theatres and receptions at Compiègne.

M. Thouvenel, formerly Minister of Foreign Affairs, has been seriously ill, but is recovering.

The townspeople of Calais gave M. Berryer, on his return from London, a torchlight procession.

Lord Brougham was present last Saturday at the sitting of the Academy of Moral and Political Sciences, in Paris, "and was received," says Galignani, "by the members present with unusual demonstrations of respect and affection, in consequence of the active part which his Lordship had just taken in the brilliant reception given to M. Berryer by the English Bar."

The Nord states that the French Government has decided that the width of the Imperial high roads shall be diminished to a space sufficient to allow three carriages to drive abreast. The surplus will be given to the proprietors of the adjacent ground, together with the trees growing there, on the sole condition that they shall maintain the plantations.

Paris was visited on Monday by a severe storm of wind and rain, which did a considerable amount of damage to property in the city and environs.

Père la Chaise contains more than 16,000 monuments, which have cost about 14 million francs.

King Otelie-Antoine, of Araucania and Patagonia (the Paris Stanbury Tuxnew, who attempted to found a little South American monarchy), has been tried in Paris on a charge of obtaining credit by swindling pretences, and has been acquitted.

The Society of Sciences, Agriculture, and Belles Lettres of the Tarn-et-Garonne has offered a gold medal of 2000f. for the best piece of poetry—poem, ode, or stanzas—on Belle Isle.

The Courrier des Deux-Charentes announces the death, in his ninety-fifth year, of M. Robillon, the senior Mayor of Paris, having acted for forty-six years in that capacity in the commune of Dieuze.

By the France-Swiss Commercial Treaty the French import duty on silk goods has been reduced 50 per cent, and, by virtue of the "most favoured nation" proviso in the Anglo-French convention, the advantages of the change will be shared by British industry.

Official advices received in Paris from Mexico represent the Juarist army as almost entirely disbanded, and the condition of affairs as most satisfactory for the Emperor Maximilian.

SPAIN.

A Royal decree has been issued appointing Admiral Pareja to the command of the Pacific squadron, in the place of Admiral Pinzon, who has been recalled.

The Madrid Gazette states that the Queen gives direct pecuniary assistance to 3000 men and 1767 women, and gives employment of different kinds to 1981 men, making in all 6751 individuals. This relief costs her Majesty a sum of 10,000 duros, or rather more than 2l. each. In the number just mentioned there are persons of all classes, from the lowest to the most humble.

Inundations have occurred near Valencia, by which twenty-seven villages have been destroyed, and great loss of life has been caused.

There are accounts from Catalonia of serious rioting amongst the unemployed operatives at various points of that district. There is much distress in that district, in consequence of the cotton famine. Factories have been sacked or burnt at Reus and Villanova.

ITALY.

King Victor Emmanuel, in addition to the surrender of three millions from his Civil List to the public Treasury, has transferred from the domain of the Crown to the national mass of property five of the Royal residences, with the appurtenances, to be dealt out for the benefit of the country. One of these is in Lombardy, two in the Neapolitan provinces, one in Sicily, and one in Piedmont.

The Generals and orderly officers of the households of the King and of Prince Humbert have recommended the pay received from his Majesty's privy purse. The sum paid to the Generals was £1400 a year, and to the others, £80.

The Canowitch arrested at Turin last week incognito, alighting at the Hotel de l'Europe, where he was visited by the Duke d'Aosta and Prince Carignan. On Wednesday the King and the Russian Prince exchanged calls.

The debate on the bill for transferring the capital has been proceeding during the past week in the Chamber of Deputies. At last Saturday's sitting General Della Marmora, the Prime Minister, made a speech in which he expressed his hope that Austria would be induced to accept the Franco-Italian Convention. He stated that at first he was himself opposed to it, but he changed, and his early apprehensions removed, and he was now prepared to act with his colleagues in supporting the treaty. The Roman question still remained clear in all men's minds, but, as regards the means of solving that problem, it was not undesirable to have time before them. He had great confidence in the Emperor of the French, who he believed re-speaking as a private individual—would assist the Italians in solving the question of Venice. Some arrangement with regard to Venice might become possible, and he even believed that the present Emperor of Austria might be brought to fresh resolutions with this object. On Monday Marquis Pepoli, who opposed the Convention, spoke. He called attention to its bearing upon European questions. "The Roman question (he said) concerns the liberty of the world, because Rome is the centre of European reaction. We cannot obtain conciliation by violence, by stratagem, or by the violation of treaties, but by moral force. A solution obtained by violent means would be a fresh cause of conspiracy against liberty. After the Convention the Austrian question alone remains in Italy. The powers created by the Convention compel the Italian Government to advance with liberty. It is necessary to solve the Roman question by demolishing feudal Rome in the interests of Christian Rome." He urged the Chamber to avoid any declaration of principles which might for ever compromise the dignity of the country. The rejection of the Convention would disunite the House of Europe, destroy public credit, and provoke Italy to attempt culpable enterprises. The question of the clerical party in Europe were bound up with the existence of Italy. Signor Boggio attacked the Convention. On Wednesday Signor Tecchio spoke against the Convention and the transfer of the capital. Signor Mancini declared himself in favour of both measures. The general debate then closed.

AUSTRIA.

The Session of the Reichsrath was opened on Monday by a speech in which the Emperor declared that a good understanding and friendly relations existed between Austria and the other great Powers, congratulated his people on the conclusion of peace with Denmark, urged legislation for the improvement of the finances and of railway communication, and announced that he was negotiating respecting the politico-economical unity of Germany.

A new State loan for 25,000,000 florins, bearing 5 per cent interest, was officially announced at Vienna last week. The issue price is fixed at 87.

The Governor of Dalmatia has issued a proclamation that, with the exception of high treason and rioting, the treatment of crimes and offences under the jurisdiction of the military tribunals during the state of siege will henceforward be transferred to the civil tribunals.

Milan newspapers publish letters from Venetia telling of conflicts between bands of insurgents and Austrian troops, in which several of the latter were killed and wounded. The district of Friuli has been proclaimed in a state of siege.

DENMARK AND GERMANY.

The treaty of peace between Denmark and the German great Powers having been fully ratified by Denmark—the final vote in its favour having been passed during the week by the Upper House of the Diet—and the King signing it next day—the formal exchange of the ratifications took place at Vienna on Wednesday.

M. de Bille, Secretary of Legation, will remain in Vienna as Danish Chargé-d'Affaires.

RUSSIA.

Lord Napier, who is about to leave St. Petersburg to take the place of Sir A. Buchanan as British Minister at the Prussian Court, made a brief speech to a deputation of his countrymen who waited upon him last Saturday to bid him farewell. England and Russia, he said, were convinced of the necessity of maintaining peace, and this had caused the great change in the feelings of England towards Russia. The relations of the two countries were now most satisfactory, and he trusted that the rapprochement would be rendered closer by commercial reforms on the part of Russia, and by a more received policy on the part of that Government on the Eastern question.

On Thursday week the Viceroy, Count Berg, opened the ordinary Session of the State Council for Poland. "The Government," he said, "is called to the task of rebuilding the shattered edifice, in order to repair the damages Poland has inflicted upon herself."

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA.

The Intercolonial Conference, which began its sittings at Quebec on the 10th ult., closed its proceedings on the 27th. A despatch from Montreal states that the report of the proceedings and resolutions of the Conference is to be brought home by the Hon. J. A. Macdonald, Attorney-General, for Her Majesty's approval. Until after this event, the same correspondent therefore says, the utmost reticence will be observed. The tone of the speeches was particularly loyal, and met with deserved approbation. The delegates from the maritime provinces have been feted in brilliant style in the principal towns of Canada West.

The population of the States which are to form the Confederation of British America is as follows, viz.:—Upper Canada, 1,600,000; Lower Canada, 1,200,000; Nova Scotia, 330,000; New Brunswick, 260,000; Newfoundland, 130,000; Prince Edward Island, 80,000: total, 3,600,000.

After much hesitation on the part of the Hon. M. Edmonds, who represents the United States Government, the further proceedings in connection with the trial for the Alleged Fenian Raid have been transferred from St. John to Montreal. The Judges at Moutreal had refused to grant a writ of habeas corpus for the raiders, on the ground that they were not in actual custody, but merely under bail, and that the commitment had been made. A judicial investigation into the affair, under the Attorney-General, is in progress at Montreal.

During the month of September 1461 immigrants arrived in Quebec, of whom 928 sailed from England, 431 from Ireland, 337 from Scotland, and 144 from Germany. The total number of immigrants who have arrived during the present year is 17,970, an increase of 6[illegible] over the corresponding period of 1861. The demand for agricultural labourers and female servants was large throughout the season, and no difficulty was experienced in finding work for those suited to the wants of the country.

By an act of the Canadian Legislature the city of Hamilton has been authorised to borrow by issuing debentures the amount required for existing debentures bonds, which loan six per cent per annum interest, for new ones payable thirty years hence, bearing interest, payable half-yearly, for the first ten years at four per cent per annum, for the second ten years at five per cent, and for the third ten years at six per cent. This arrangement has been accepted by the bondholders in Great Britain. The debenture debts of Hamilton amount to £104,690 sterling, and £74,000 currency, about half of which was contributed to the Great Western, Galt and Guelph, Hamilton and Port Dover, and Preston and Berlin railways. The debt of £74,240 sterling and £46,789 currency for the construction of waterworks.

Notice has been given in the British Columbian Gazette that Dr. Rae was expected to leave by way of Victoria for Hope Mountains, completing his survey of the proposed line of telegraph, and that the Governor requested the inhabitants and other public officers to render him with such aid and assistance as he might require. Accounts from the mine adjacent to Lac La Hache are favourable as to the yield of the Quesnelle, having come down the Fraser from Fort George in a canoe with one Indian.

The Legislative Assembly of Vancouver Island had passed resolutions favouring a Federal union with British Columbia.

AMERICA.

We had hoped that the New York or the City of Glasgow would have brought us news of the result of the presidential election. Both these steamers have, however, arrived without bringing the expected intelligence. They were off Cape Race on the 9th inst., a day after the election, but the weather, unhappily, was too thick to communicate. Indeed, it was not until the 10th that information of the usual edition.

There is little war news of moment. Grant's army has returned to its former position. It has been ascertained that the country around the Southern Railroad is impoverished. The Secretary of Government the Confederates on the Boyton plank-road charged the right flank of the 2nd Corps at a point where the connection between the 2nd and 5th Corps was not formed. The New York Herald correspondent asserts that this forced Grant to withdraw his troops to a new position. During Burley's movement General Warren resulted the Confederate position on the Williamsburg road, but was repulsed with heavy loss. The right lost 1500 men, and captured 800 prisoners. On Sunday, the 26th ult., the Confederates penetrated into Grant's lines for some distance between the 2nd and 5th Corps, taking several prisoners. They afterwards charged their former works, but were repulsed. According to the latest accounts, Grant's troops were engaged in building fortifications, a significant indication that they expected to winter in their present positions.

There have been no fresh movements in the Shenandoah Valley.

The accounts regarding the movements of General Hood and General Sherman's armies are obscure and uncertain. Hood, as stated in our last number, had invaded Tennessee, and was pressed with the loss of four guns and a hundred prisoners.

The Confederate iron-clad ram Albemarle, which had caused much uneasiness in the minds of the inmates of North Carolina, has been destroyed. One launch was sunk by the Confederate fire, and nearly the whole crew of the launch were killed in consequence of the ram was accomplished by a boat with a "torpedo attachment." A naval correspondent says that the Albemarle was destroyed by means of two boats, about the size of a ship's launch, fitted up with torpedo apparatus. The destruction he does not describe.

The United States gun-boat Undine was captured by the Confederates at Fort Herman on the Tennessee River.

The Yallabusha, the two Confederate iron-clad rams at Greenwood which escaped from Wilmington, had destroyed six vessels off the Northern coast, and the Confederate privateer Florida was about to be at sea, and to have made a capture.

President Davis had appointed the 16th inst. for a day of thanksgiving and prayer for the success of the Confederate arms.

The Richmond Sentinel, the organ of the Confederate Government, recommends the raising of 300,000 men.

President Lincoln has proclaimed the Nevada territory a State of the Union.

At a mass meeting of merchants and bankers, held in Wall-street, in favour of McClellan, President Lincoln's abolition policy was condemned, and it was resolved that the financial and commercial interests of the country required a change of administration.

The war despatches have had a meeting in New York. General Dix read an address refusing to support the Chicago nominee or platform and recommending the re-election of Governor Seymour.

Secretary Seward has announced to the Mayors of Buffalo and New York that he had received information of the existence of a conspiracy in Canada to send incendiaries into the principal Northern cities on the day of the presidential election. The Mayor of New York had replied that he disbelieved the information, but was prepared to maintain the public safety; and the Democratic journals accused the Government of inventing the whole story in order to have a pretext for proclaiming martial law.

A Democratic torchlight procession was attacked on the night of the 30th ult. in Philadelphia, and a serious fight ensued, in which a number of persons were severely injured and two killed.

The new Constitution has been officially proclaimed in Maryland by Governor Bradford, the Court of Appeal having refused to issue an order striking out the soldiers' votes. The majority claimed is 475. Maryland is therefore declared a free State from the 1st of November. Salutes in honour of the event have been fired in Baltimore.

The military commission have condemned Donahue and Ferry, New York State agents at Baltimore accused of forging soldiers' votes, to imprisonment for life.

The price of gold has again risen—the latest quotation being 192 per cent premium.

ILLUSTRATIONS OF THE WAR IN JAPAN.

We this week publish two Engravings from the sketches made by Mr. C. Wirgman, our Special Artist and Correspondent in Japan, who was present on the day of the attack by the allied squadron during the attack upon the batteries of the Daimio Prince of Nagato, in the Strait of Simonoseki, on Sept. 5 and 6. The situation of this place, at the western extremity of the Sowonada, or Inland Sea of Japan, was fully described in our last. The province of Nagato, to which the murderers belong, and in which the Japanese stronghold, Simonoseki, is ruled by a daimio named Chiushiu, one of those powerful vassals of the Tycoon who, like the feudal princes of Germany or France in the Middle Ages, while they own a nominal allegiance to the Imperial authority, are very apt to have a policy of their own and maintain a certain amount of warlike forces at their own disposal. Several of these daimios, within their half-independent local jurisdiction, have, amongst more than one occasion, to defeat the operation of those treaties by which the sovereign Government at Jeddo had promised that European commerce should enjoy free access to the Japanese shores. Prince of Satsuma, it will be recollected, was compelled by the bombardment of Kagosima, a twelvemonth ago, to give satisfaction for the injuries which had resulted to some of our countrymen from this course of proceeding. The Prince of Nagato, who has persisted in closing the passage of Simonoseki against foreign vessels for more than twelve months, for his part, the warning lesson that he received from a British squadron in August, 1863, when the fleet under Admiral Sir Augustus Kuper, Commander-in-Chief, Sir Rutherford Alcock, in conjunction with the French, Dutch, and American diplomatic agents at the Court of Jeddo, had left the naval expedition for the purpose of disarming the hostile batteries and forcing the entrance of this channel. The ships of war detailed for this undertaking were the Euryalus, Conqueror, Coromandel, Tartar the Conqueror, the Barossa, the Perseus, the Argus, the Coquette, and the Banterer. The French squadron, under Admiral Jaurès, and the French—the Semiramis, the Duplein, and the Tancrède, under the command of Vice-Admiral Jaurès; Dutch—The Medalen-Cruiser, Dijmphna, Metalen, and the Amsterdam—the American Minister, having no vessel of war at command, chartered the Pembroke, a fine steamship of some 1500 tons, which flag was displayed, in order to show that America was acting in unison with the other Powers. The force of the allies, which left the anchorage of sixteen vessels, with an aggregate armament of 250 guns, conveying also a detachment of the Royal Engineers and a force of 1400 marines, was a fine looking sight. Passing the Straits and arrived on the 4th of September before Simonoseki. In the afternoon of the following day, by accurately observing the signals which were posted as shown in our Engraving, the plan being that the corvettes were to form in a line along the south side of the channel, while the vessels of the heavier weight of metal, namely the steam frigates, should direct a cross fire against all the batteries, defiling along the north side of the channel. The Euryalus, the flag-ship of Admiral Kuper, the Eurydice and the Semiramis, advancing between the two lines, should direct their fire against the batteries generally as they passed without resistance. At four p.m. each of the vessels was at its post. The Euryalus, with Sir A. Kuper's flag at her mizen-yard, is represented exactly as she was when engaged with the batteries, and the Semiramis of the French Admiral, is at the extreme left; and the Amsterdam, the Dutch flag-ship, which is also the Queen's ship, is the next to the steamer Ta-Kiang, with the American ensign, lies between the Euryalus and the Semiramis. A portion of the hull of the Conqueror is seen to the extreme right. The enemy's batteries, which opened fire with steamer Ta-Kiang, with the American ensign, lies between the Euryalus and the Semiramis. A portion of the hull of the Conqueror is seen to the extreme right. The enemy's batteries, which opened fire with great vigour, were seven in number, and mounted in all sixty guns. Under the hill, to the right hand, is seen the flying pinnaces, occupied by the Persian, Mr. Thomas Blake Glover, Bunker, exchanging fire with the batteries in front of them. These vessels, with the Queen, were kept under steam, so that they could be shifted from place to place during the action. The first shot was fired by the corvettes, and instantly returned. For about twenty minutes this fire was kept up, when the ships, as they came to shore, are arranged in two divisions. The corvettes form one division, the Tancrède, the Duplein, and the Dupetit Thouars, Dupetit Kruz, Barossa, Djuaida, and Leopard; besides which the Coquette, somewhat detached from the rest, was engaged with the batteries on Akoneseki, to the left hand. The corvettes are anchored opposite three of the batteries, with which they are hotly engaged. The battery shown in the opposite page, with the steamer Ta-Kiang, opening on one of fifteen

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS

LONDON: SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 19, 1864.

THESE Pagans give us a great deal of trouble. We are not referring to the half-conquered New Zealanders, to the thriftchastised Japanese, nor to certain other parties who, engaged in the most laudable efforts to civilize fratricidal men, are sadly clamorous in their appeals to Heaven. We allude to Pagans who have long ceased to live, except in books which will never die; and we specify the ringleaders by the names of Homer, Æschylus, and Pindar, and also by those of Virgil, Horace, and Juvenal. These are a great many more; but the persons we have pointed out may be taken as representatives of a most troublesome band. Like Mr. Charles Surface, in what was thought a fine play when educated people were playgoers, but which the sensationists vote a bore, our friends above named "give a great many worthy persons cause for much anxiety." Bishops preach about them, members of Parliament harangue about them, and non-intelligent correspondents of journals twaddle over them to an alarming extent. What a load of shame they ought to carry about with them in Elysium for having written so much better than any one else, for thousands of years, has been able to write!

Of course, the conventional and right thing to say about classical education is, that there is a medium in all things. That a gentleman's education cannot be considered complete unless he is acquainted with Latin and Greek; and that it is humiliating to see who is executing Latin exercises and who is reading a high-class novel to them, or walking with them along the Strand, to be unable to explain an epitaph, a quotation, or the inscription over Exeter Hall door. That, on the other hand, too much time may be given to the study of the dead languages, which people can do creditably in a few years, who cannot write a decent English note; and that, if the above dilemmas are painful, so is the position of a man who cannot ask a French waiter for the mustard or abuse a German custom-house officer for his brutality. That Latin verses should be the last thing in the world that in education express regard should be paid to the intended career of a young man; and that, while the youth of fortune or the lad who is to enter the learned professions may reasonably be taught a great deal of Latin and Greek, he who is designed to seek his fortune abroad, or in the military or naval service, or in mercantile life, ought to be familiar with French, German, and Italian. Now, this is very decorous ten-table talk; and persons who emit it with a certain gravity and self-satisfaction may be set down as men of sound and profound doctrine, will be regarded as very wise men of the world, and will go up, in matrons' estimation, as advisers and executors.

And really the matter might be left in the keeping of commonplace common-sense, which we believe does regulate the education of most youths whose parents are not idiots, but for the incessant controversies which noisy folk are always getting up about the classics. These demonstrations, usually made by persons who can get a good hearing in the world, every now and then force upon the unoffending journalist the necessity of making a fight for the old Pagan altars and hearths, and of showing that their desecration would be an act of suicidal barbarism. Recent speeches and addresses have brought up the defenders of the old shrines to do such strenuous battle—vigilant tu ante Lares—that it is not our business to enter the lists on the present occasion. We rather propose to express our satisfaction that a new and most potent army of allies has come to the aid of the classics, and that the action of this contingent will effectually demolish the anti-classics, at least for many a day to come. We allude, joyfully and gratefully, to the ladies. While the men of the new school are deriding Homer and Virgil, and teaching that a boy had better be able to talk argot than to tell who were the Argonauts, the ladies have suddenly rallied round the grand old statues, and have proclaimed that they shall not be thrown down. In more prosaic words, we find that the study of Latin, and in many cases of Greek, has become a part of female education. We are going back to the days of Lady Jane Grey and Queen Elizabeth; and it is quite delightful to hear the dainty little maidens who are the pride of our English households "talk as familiarly of second aorists as boys of thirteen do of puppy dogs." The governess who sits beside you at dinner, and who in all, save vulgar households, is discreetly the most honoured of the guests, is now proud to tell you that her pupil can scan with very creditable skill. Homer has turned one of Mr. Tennyson's best passages into Latin, and Adelaide writes her journal well, not in Greek, but in Greek letters. And if you do not take very great care how you ventilate your guesses about Mr. Gladstone's views of Homer and Christianity, Miss Brown will very soon convince that you have not read the book as you ought to have done.

What do the anti-classics say to this? Is not their Vandal flank turned? Will it not be impossible henceforth for gentlemen to be ignorant of Greek and Latin; nay, will not the present generation of them, to say nothing of the rising one, be obliged to furbish up their learning, and avoid being put to perpetual shame by their countrywomen? Fancy sitting next to a young lady who has received your matrimonial designs, and, in talking of the last statue that has been sent to Great Russell-street, receiving the penultimate in Praxidamas instead of the ante-penultimate, and then hearing her introduce the word with the right sound, and your rival on the other side of her listening with a slight smile! Would you not be instantly filled with an unlimital sentiment towards the father who had so frightfully neglected your education? Would you not devote your pedagogue, with his new commercial system, to the places "beneath the deep Tartarean prisons"? Suppose that you are asked by the ladies of the season whether Earl Russell used curriculum rightly or wrongly in his address speech, and your reason is demanded, as Lady Isidora is going to write about it in a letter to somebody else whom you know! It would be easy to multiply images of dismay, remorse, and despair, to any man who goes into society can do it for himself, and shudder. There is no appeal and no escape. The ladies have gone over to the classic side, and those who care about ladies' society will have to follow, and to qualify themselves that they may be able to follow. It is strange that when coarse hands are trying to shake the statues, they should be held up by dainty hands of five and a half, but so it is; and the men of the day had better not listen to nonsense like some that we have heard lately, but take to preserve instead of French novels.

THE COURT.

The Queen continues at Windsor Castle, in the enjoyment of good health.

On Thursday week her Majesty, accompanied by the Princess of Wales, drove in the Home Park grounds. Princess Helena drove by the Hon. Mrs. Bruce, drove out. Princess Louisa also took a drive. The Prince of Wales went out shooting.

Yesterday week the Queen, accompanied by the Princess of Wales and attended by Colonel the Hon. A. Hardinge, drove out. Princess Louisa also took a drive. The Prince of Wales, attended by Lieutenant-General the Hon. C. Grey, Lord Methuen, Lieutenant-Colonel Kingscote, and Capt. Teesdale, went out shooting. Earl and Lady Bloomfield arrived at the castle, and had the honour of dining with her Majesty.

On Saturday last the Queen walked and drove in the grounds of the castle. The Princess of Wales and Princess Helena drove out. Princess Louisa also took a drive. THE NEW DOVER AND CALAIS STEAM-BOAT

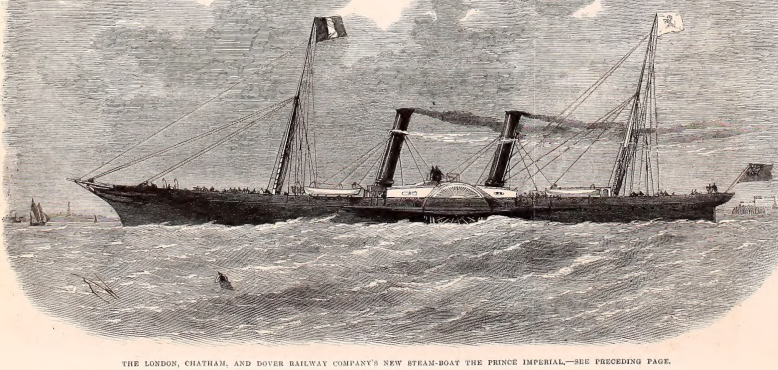
PRINCE IMPERIAL

OUR Engraving represents the new paddle-wheel steam-boat Prince Imperial, which was launched a few weeks since from the yard of her builders, Messrs. James Ash and Son, Cubitt's Town, Millwall. This vessel, which is considered the most powerful, in proportion to her tonnage, of all the steamers yet constructed on the Thames, is of 500 tons burden, and her dimensions are 180 ft. length between perpendiculars, 24 ft. breadth of beam, and 12½ ft. depth of hold. Her engines are by Messrs. Penn and Son. She has lately made a trial-trip from Calais to Dover, previously to being placed on the regular mail-packet service of the London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Company. The passage across the Channel was made in 1 hr. 30 min., and the return trip, by the same route, in one hour 4 minutes, the quickest time on record.

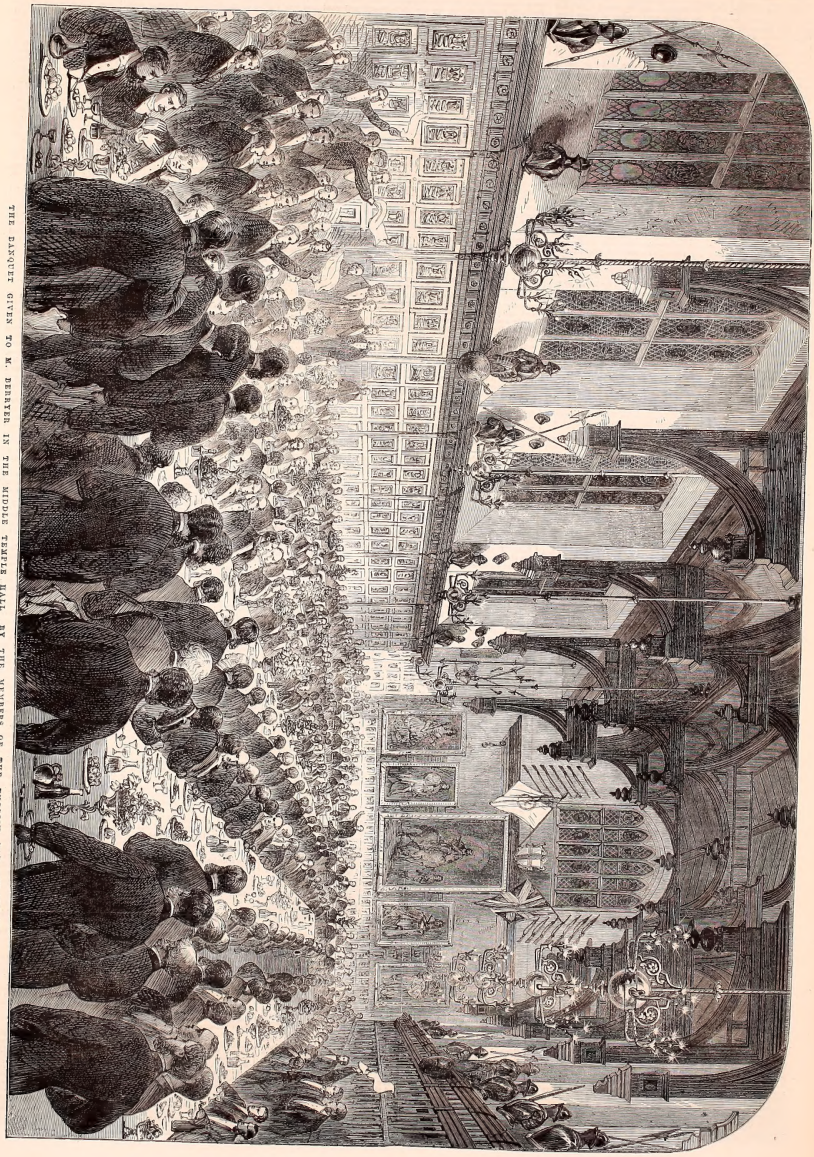
JOHN LEECH.

WHILE preparing for the readers of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS a portrait of the great artist whose early death has carried grief into the households, the directors of the Journal have desired that the engraving should be accompanied by a memoir of its subject, and they do me the honour of believing that an acceptable sketch of the life of my late friend could be supplied by myself. If I attempt the work, it is only because many years of close intimacy with John Leech have probably made me acquainted with some incidents in his history and some characteristics of his nature which may be less familiar to others. I disclaim any idea of composing a formal memoir. His death has been too recent to permit me to essay any critical record of his works, and still less can a sorrowful friend, within a few days of his friend's obsequies, undertake to analyze his character in any memorial that could be a worthy addition to the graceful and generous tributes which have been universally offered by the British press to the memory of him whom we have lost. Hereafter, I trust, some such memorial may be written, and the last service which friends can offer be paid to

The gladdener of a thousand hearths,
The idol of his own.



Of the earlier portion of the life of John Leech, I have little to say which is not to be found in the more carefully compiled books of reference in every library. London claims him, rightfully; but he was born in the county of Surrey, on the 29th of August, 1817. He was educated at the Charter-house, where his friend William Makepeace Thackeray, near whose remains his own are laid, was his older schoolfellow. He always retained a strong interest in his school, and frequently attended its festivities; and, although there is no doubt that school-life thirty-five years ago was rougher than now, especially for the younger boys, I have no recollection of hearing John Leech complain of any great hardships undergone during this part of his life. Let me note here that among the advantages which he gained at the noble old school was a facility which very well-informed persons are in the habit of stating not to be invariably acquired in the great places of education—the power of writing excellent English. The point may not have attracted general notice, but the very happily phrased inscriptions attached to so many of his cuts—inscriptions which fully explain all that the artist desired to say, and which would be spoiled by the addition or disturbance of a word—are among what the world would consider trifles, but which no true artist will regard as such. And he wrote admirable letters, full of point and humour.



THE LATE JOHN LEECH.

The medical profession was chosen for him, and he mastered it to a certain extent, and certainly took much interest in it, for to the end of his life he enjoyed a discussion that bore upon any topic connected with the ars medendi; and those who are better qualified than I am to bear testimony on the subject have told me that, in his modest, half-hesitating way, he showed that his medical acquirements had been no mere feats of memory. But I take it that no man ever studied a grave subject under more ludicrous conditions. The gentleman to whom his instruction was confided, a Mr. Whittle, had special tastes which were by no means in accordance even with professional decorum. This eccentric person piqued himself on his excellence as a gymnast, and was also deeply addicted to pigeon-fancying. No patients had a chance of attention when the preparation for a pedestrian feat was going on; and from the roof of his house, where he tended those fatal birds, no invocation, even if it were an interesting case of for apose, could bring the muscular priest of Lucina. Under such a master the young doctor was somewhat irregularly introduced to his art, and it is not strange that his tutor's professional career came to an untimely end. When lady-patients, taking a walk, are suddenly surrounded by a hurrying and shouting crowd, in the middle of which, as they escape, they behold their medical adviser, in quaint attire, rushing to pick up stones in his mouth, an early termination of the relations between the healer and his patients is not impossible. The singular person in question afforded his pupil in after days a capital subject for his pencil, and he supplied Albert Smith with materials for a character in one of his early novels, in which, aided by Leech's illustrations, the author has given a diverting presentment of the sporting surgeon. During this novitiate, Leech's liking for horses probably received its first development. A friend of his own age, who was closely occupied in business during the day, was the happy owner of two horses, which it was his delight to drive, tandem fashion, during a large part of the night, and Leech was his constant companion in these curious excursions. How many clever bits of driving life, of visions of savage and sleepy toll-keepers, of strange lights in dark country roads, and of discomfited wayfarers suddenly charged by reckless charioteers, may we not owe to these nocturnal expeditions by John Leech and his friend Charles Adams?

Of the three celebrated doctors who, according to the old-fashioned proverb (wiser than most of its family), can cure almost all ordinary ailments—Dr. Diet, Dr. Quiet, and Dr. Merryman—John Leech was clearly destined to administer the prescriptions of one only, the last. His talent with the pencil became remarkable, I believe, even before foot-racing and pugilism dying and closed his master's establishment. He very soon learned that this talent was marketable, and he turned it to good account. It can be only the middle-aged readers of these lines who will remember that the great sporting newspaper of their youth, still a great sporting newspaper, and a necessary of life to thousands—the General Advertiser—on Christmas Day is so humorously pathetically deplored by one of Leech's own swells in the early numbers of Punch, used to be adorned with sketches of matchless generality. Bell's Life, which has had the honour of reading two at least of our greatest men in their early days, was constantly enriched by the young hand of Leech. I think that the proprietors afterwards published the whole of the sketches in one grand volume (including work by other artists), which was a storehouse of fun, and the literature of which was sufficiently humorous for the purpose. Leech made many other contributions about this time to the comic pictorial publications of the day, but he first shook him into general notice is, perhaps, now almost forgotten. When Sir Rowland Hill suffered upon us the penny post, and which we have received since the Bill of Rights, an envelope in aid of the new postal system was published by the authorities, and it had rather more sentimentalism about it than was desirable. It was a combination of sympathy, or may be found in the stamp-album, now so afflicting to all whose money or time is limited. Those who never saw it may well be told that about two thirds of the envelope were covered with a picture, designed by Mr. Mulready, representing Britannia in the act of dispatching winged messengers with letters to all parts of the world, and even the sides of the paper were groups of personages eagerly welcoming the despatches, with appropriate signs of their direction. The exceeding nobleness-like character of the device, and certain lines and effects in the figures, struck the young satirist, and he executed a caricature envelope, in which the original was so completely and yet so humorously parodied, that, as a practical affair, than it was, it could hardly have conveyed.

He got us a postal envelope, sold enormously, though, of course, but a small percentage returned came to a comparatively small number, and it was not only largely bought, but largely used for letters by the irreverent. This piece asked what he had done [illegible]. And when that question begins to be asked, the sail ceases to flap in the wind, and the spray begins to fall from the bows.

In August, 1841, John Leech began work which he never quitted but with life. Three weeks before the first number of Punch appeared, and in the same publication, with engravings on wood of his drawings specially secured for the new periodical. In the fourth number, the large page cut in two, and the subject in full. The engraving was called "Foreign Affairs," and is recollection of the Continental tour of those caricatures, of male and female foreigners as they appeared in London. The figure of a man more or less than a dirty-pink-faced, sneering folk, and several were from Lestar-square. With this picture Leech's reputation was established, and it is a peculiarity of his which his best works appeared, I think, the more vigorous, up to the issue of the very last one. Before the first year had begun in the 1217th number (an Irishwoman remonstrating with her husband, who was also singing—"I enjoyed myself in a street fight), which appeared when the cunning right hand had forgotten its cunning.

Henceforth, the life of Leech was one of well-earned prosperity and happiness. The success of first gradually and then rapidly, increased; no wealthy successes could spoil, endeared him to numerous friends, some of whom he attached him by the closest ties. He was to mourn large circle of friends, among whom were men highly placed in the world, and with whom his ever maintained a position of social equality. I shall be easily pardoned for remembering given and that his party was succeeding, by those who recollect, as they read, how the handsome face lighted up, and how, when the immediate fun or whatever had aroused us had subsided, the old genial "allow," followed, and we began to be tickled into a laugh again at an interchange of glances with a friend. I am sure that I shall be pardoned for these lines, if I say that I linger too long over these recollections-others I can only regret that I am writing extempore reminiscences, and with no effort to reduce this memorial into a biography. In the midst of spirit, I will add that Leech's manner towards women was ever the gentlest and most refined. He was the truest of gentlemen in this exquisite series of feminine beauties, which for many years have received a justice never extended before? The English woman has her due. And why not? And why speak of the English children whom he drew so lovingly? I name them only to say that character is in a word, I might be difficult which, did I try to add that all the children loved him.

In the above sketch I have used some of my own feelings, I have sought to sketch John Leech as I knew him. I will note, for the sake of keeping to the point I intended to be, a personal memorial, that my first acquaintance with him was made from a note written to me by the late artist, whose marvellous love of combining the lightest touches of artificial life, and of showing them with a mere genius, was one of the few things that could make me forget, from the time to a place of public amusement, gave, on the evening I speak of, a large party at his house on the following day. The party was given, that were variously decked that of Cinderella, whose name I will remember, as Chorus to Modes. The black trousers and tasteful leather boots of the present life were before [illegible] but above was the costume of the time of the Tudors. There were some splendid and also that Ivy was the object of the party; but the garb that was worn by Ivy herself was the most remarkable. Almost on the full figure of Queen Elizabeth, with the ruff, the stomacher, and the petticoat of the time

MEMBERS OUT OF PARLIAMENT.

SOME one professing to be sage has said that the world is governed by phrases. Certainly public men have reason to complain that unhappy sayings cling to them disadvantageously with greater tenacity than blunders in action. A sufferer peculiarly in this respect is Mr. Disraeli. It was not the financial ineptitude of his Budget that was the real cause of his being driven out of office in 1852, but the ridicule which he incurred by the assertion of his organized plagiarism in his funeral oration on the death of Wellington had previously practically overturned him. Of late he has not been so adventurous in speech as when he dared to talk, with the air of a savan, about the crossing of the breed of sheep. Very recently members farmers have let that effusion been led to doubt of his fitness to head the country party; and several gentlemen, who, as the possessors of large landed estates are theoretically supposed to be qualified to give practical opinions on agricultural matters, have been critically lively on this discovery, which was to give a new political advancement to rank amongst breeders of stock. Notably, Mr. H. G. Sturt has been making merry at the late escapade of his member-ship, and encouraging caricaturists at his expense amongst bucolicists at Shaftesbury, which, in times gone by, would have given it that they had been framed in bore-colour. But this Mr. Sturt is, for a single session, one of the powers can be taken as indicating his capabilities, rather a master of cynical merriment. A solitary speech of his is on record, and it is recorded in the memories of those who care to remember Parliamentary specialties, which was delivered from behind the Speaker's chair when Mr. Disraeli and his colleagues occupied the seats of honour thereon. In that most amusing and cruelly truthful effusion, Mr. Sturt sketched the legislative life of the country gentleman in a vein which was quite Peter-Pindaric, which brought roars of laughter from every quarter of the house except the spot where the sitters for the droll portraits which he was drawing cowered under a shower of ridicule and irony, the more terrible as coming not only from an unexpected, but from a parliamentary man, as a house-quarter. Certain electioneering events in Dorsetshire (for which county Mr. Sturt sits a member) soon after showed that he could not afford to be independent in the house than he; but it was exhibiting independence with a vengeance to run a tilt there through the leaders of his own party. Probably Mr. Sturt was affright'd "even at the sound himself had made," for since then he has religiously kept silent. It is, therefore, the only more that we have been able to detect him indulging in the same erratic vein in more recent years. The Conservative party of the Scottish members, were immediately preceded in a procession which marched about the Lord's day by a Highland Antediluvian Band, for an explanatory account of which we offer a prayer to our musical critic. Of course the Conservative members voted in what to have been a feast, in the more vulgar sense of that term; but the not faithful chronicler of the occasion declares that he was a most unfortunate calculator that the cost of the caterer in regard to the amount of food a given number of persons generally consume. But what of that?—there was the bill to be paid, and to come, however the half-hungry and half-thirsty orators may have felt, in an unusual degree, a deficiency in that source from which is generally derived the fire of their after dinner. Lord Campbell has been what in nautical phrase is called a banyan-day with him, Lord Clarence Paget first rose separately to speak, which he was prevented by organisation, and spoke brave words about the pier, and literally roused (the word is his, not ours) the Government generally at last.

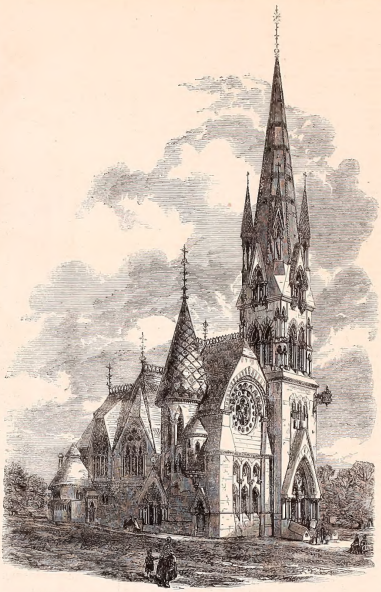
TRINITY CHURCH, IRVINE, AYRSHIRE.



OUR Engraving represents the new church built for the United Presbyterian congregation of the Rev. W. B. Robertson, at Irvine, in Ayrshire. This edifice stands on a raised bank some thirty feet above the level of Bridgegate-street, its west side facing the river, and its east side of the town, with transepts north and south. The tower (which is not yet built) will be at the north-east corner. The general plan of the church, which is in the Venetian-Gothic style, is fan-shaped. The difficulty of roofing such a building is overcome by placing four pillars connected with beams, over which the walls of the church are brought. By this means, though the church is upwards of 70 ft. broad, the span of the roof is reduced to 30 ft. Through this construction the exterior of the room assumes a cruciform shape; and three of the members of the cross are treated as apses—viz., east, north, and south. The fourth, a main front, consists of a large gable about 90 ft. high, to be flanked on one side by the tower, and on the other by the sessions house. The centre front consists below of an arcade, having a large central arch with two smaller arches on each side. Above these are two two-light windows, with tracery in the heads; and above this again is the large wheel window, which is 28 ft. in diameter. The stonework of the gable above this is radiated, the radiations being formed of chequered stonework of dark green, white, and red stone. The tower will consist of a massive porch at the foot, and will then rise quite plain to the top story of the tower. This will be elaborated with pinnacles at the angles and a two-light window on each face. From this the spire will rise to a height of about 190 ft. The sessions house is a circular building, of the height of the main wall of the church, and is finished with a conical roof, to be terminated by an elaborate finial. The lower part of the sessions house forms the arcade with arches. Above this are two-light windows. The lower arches and two-light windows are connected by pilasters surmounted by a pointed arch. In the eastern facit and the apse behind the pulpit is a large three-light window of double columns, with tracery in the heads. All the capitals and arches are enriched, some with conventional and some with naturalistic foliage. The vestry is an octagon, at the north-east side of the church, and is surmounted by an octangular roof, which rises in two divisions to a considerable height. The architect is Mr. F. T. Pilkington, George-street, Edinburgh.

of Mr. Pilkington, for the congregation of the Rev. J. H. Wilson, removed from the Fountainbridge Free Church, is the subject of one of our illustrations. It may be remembered that a few years ago the sum of £10,000 was bequeathed by the late Miss Barclay, of Edinburgh, for the purpose of erecting a church for the accommodation of one of the Free Church congregations of the city, the choice of such congregation being vested in the trustees of the fund. The congregation of the Fountainbridge Free Church, having increased very rapidly in numbers, was the one selected. By the terms of Miss Barclay's will the congregation were bound to build a church according to the plans approved by the trustees, and to provide all necessary funds beyond the amount of the legacy. A site was purchased at the north-west corner of Brunstsfield Links, and towards this part of the work the congregation contributed between £2000 and £3000. About three years ago the trustees requested a number of architects to furnish designs for the proposed church; and that of Mr. Pilkington was preferred. The site, being of an irregular shape, and not very spacious, presented some difficulties. The architect had it out by first providing a central space for the congregation, and then attaching the tower, entrances, and offices as the ground admitted; and so well has he adapted himself to circumstances that the only portions of the site uncovered are a few oddly-shaped angles, measuring altogether but a few square yards. The body of the church is oval in shape, with an angular projection at one of its sides. Opposite this prosection the platform is placed, and the pews, which are ranged in three stages, one above and behind the other, form concentric lines on the platform. The interior being so large—82 ft. long by 70 ft. wide—Mr. Pilkington has resorted to the same arrangement which he adopted in the church at Irvine. By this plan, four massive stone pillars are introduced for the support of the roof, which is cruciform. One of the pillars stands on each side of the platform, and the others rise from among the pews. Beneath the second stage of pews a wide passage runs, from which access is obtained to the central division of the lower range of pews, and beneath the upper stage is a large schoolroom. By an arrangement of sliding screens, the passage and school-room may be opened to the church, and thus afford accommodation for nearly a thousand additional hearers. All the divisions of the church may be entered by one door, but each has a separate exit, making nine in all. By the introduction of a series of passages and side-doors, any member of the congregation may reach his seat without walking above half a dozen steps after he enters the body of the church. The interior is lined throughout with wood, painted light green. The roof, 70 ft. high, is open, and the beams, converging in the centre, are supported by an iron rod. Immediately above the platform the ceiling is richly painted and gilded, but the other portions are merely stained and varnished. The light, which is well distributed, is softened by the green cathedral glass with which the windows are filled. The external appearance of the church is sufficiently represented by our Engraving. The tower and spire at once arrest attention by their great elevation and massiveness, and the elegance of their outline and details. The tower is situated at the north-west angle of the main building, and consists of a basement and two stories. In its front is the principal entrance to the church, a gableted porch, 34 ft. in height and 18 ft. in breadth, supported on a pair of shafts at each side, and containing two doorways surmounted by a pointed arch, and separated by a group of shafts bearing carved capitals. The spire rises to a height of 263 ft. from the pavement—the same height as that of Chichester Cathedral. It forms a striking object in the vista of the Lothian-road, looking from Princes-street; it rises with peculiar dignity and grace above the foliage of the Meadows. On the east side of the tower, facing the north, is a massive gable, divided into two stages, the lower stage supported by an arcade of three lofty pointed arches, each of which contains a trefoil-pointed arched window, surmounted by a quatrefoil light. The second stage contains a circular window, 22 ft. in diameter, filled with geometric tracery and surmounted by an arched canopy resting on piers at the angles of the gable. The arch of the canopy is decorated by a fringe formed of red and white stones alternately. This gable is an imposing feature in the design, being 70 ft. in height. A circular tower which flanks the gable is surmounted by a lofty slated spire. This spire is ornamented by spiral bands of green slate, and is designed to form in the east elevation a connecting link between the body of the building and the great tower. On the whole, this structure must be deemed an ornament to the city of Edinburgh.

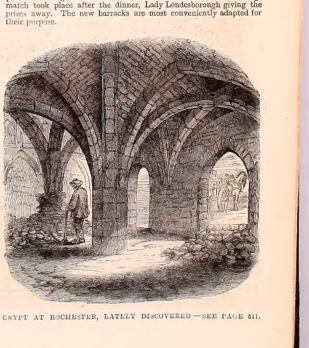
STATUE OF THE LATE PRINCE CONSORT IN PEEL PARK, SALFORD.

We have engraved a representation of Mr. Noble's statue of Prince Albert, in Peel Park, Salford, which was publicly unveiled on Monday week. It is a companion to that of her Majesty, which was inaugurated by the lamented Prince himself, as a memorial of their visit to Manchester and Salford some twelve or thirteen years ago, when they were received in Peel Park by an immense popular assemblage, including 20,000 Sunday-school children, marshalled by their teachers, on the ground. This statue is of white Sicilian marble, with a grey granite pedestal, and has cost £1100. The Prince is represented in his robes as Chancellor of Cambridge. The subscriptions received amounted to £1932, so that a considerable balance still remains in hand, and will be devoted to the Museum. The granite pedestals for the statues of the Queen and Prince are from the works of M'Donald, Field, and Co., of Aberdeen. This park now possesses four statues—viz., Sir Robert Peel, in bronze; Mr. Joseph Brotherton, late M.P. for the borough, in bronze; the Queen, in marble (erected in 1852); and that of the Prince Consort, just inaugurated.



STATUE OF PRINCE ALBERT, BY M. NOBLE, IN PEEL PARK, SALFORD.

OPENING OF SOUTHWARK BRIDGE TOLL FREE.

The sketch we have engraved represents the scene which took place at the end of Southwark Bridge on Tuesday week, about noon, when the Lord Mayor, in full state and dignity, accompanied by the Lady Mayoress, and attended by the mace and sword bearers, drove over the bridge, to celebrate its opening, for a period of six months at least, free of toll for the public use. The members of the Bridge-house Estate Committee attended in their carriages. Among others present were Mr. T. Webber, the chairman; Mr. Alderman J. C. Lawrence, Mr. Alderman Phillips, Mr. Alderman Salomons, M.P., Mr. Alderman Gibbons, and several members of the Court of Common Council. They were received by the chairman and directors of the Bridge Company, including Mr. F. H. Beandram, Mr. Carter, Mr. W. Pott, and others. Upon the arrival of the Lord Mayor and the various civic officials on the City side of the bridge, the directors of the company advanced to meet them, and the chairman briefly thanked his Lordship for his kindness in opening the bridge. He Lordship replied that it gave him great pleasure in assisting at the ceremony, as he felt sure that the bridge would, when opened free of toll, greatly facilitate the passage of traffic to and from the City, and so prove of essential benefit to the public. The temporary barrier was then removed, and the Lord Mayor and members of the Bridge-house Committee drove over the bridge to the Southwark side, and turned round. The barrier having in the meantime on that side also been removed, one of the company's officials read the following notice:—"Southwark Bridge is from this day open to the public free of toll for a period of six months, or until further orders. Opened by the chairman and directors of the Southwark Bridge Company, in the presence of the Right Hon. William Lawrence, the Lord Mayor, and the chairman and members of the Honourable the Bridge-house Committee of the corporation of London." This notice was again read after the removal of the barrier on the City side. The terms upon which this experiment of a free passage has been arranged are briefly known to our readers—the Bridge Company having agreed to let the Corporation have the public use of the bridge free of toll for a space of six months for the sum of £1834, or for twelve months for £2750, the Bridge Company undertaking all necessary repairs of roads, &c., during either the six months or the year.

NEW RIFLE VOLUNTEER BARRACKS AT HULL.

The 1st East York Rifle Volunteers have lately built themselves a commodious barrack-house at the back of Elm-tree-avenue, in the town of Hull. Our Engraving, from a photograph by Mr. S. Greenwood Hudson, represents this building, which was formally opened on the 17th ult., when the corps left their old barracks and parade-ground in Alfred-street, and marched to their new quarters with full military parade, followed by their luggage upon drays, each of which, drawn by three horses, was driven by a man dressed in a scarlet frock. Having reached the parade-ground attached to their new barracks, they formed in line and saluted their regimental colours with a feu de joie, three hearty cheers, and the music of "God Save the Queen." This performance was followed by a dinner—at which the Right Hon. Lord Londesborough presided—in the barrack-room. The company included the Mayor and Sheriff of Hull, the two borough members, and several officers of the Army and Navy, with other gentlemen, among the ladies in the gallery were Lady Londesborough and her mother, the Dowager Duchess of Beaufort. Lieutenant-Colonel Pease, the acting commander of the corps, in the course of his speech at the dinner-table, stated that the building in which they were now assembled, the foundation-stone of which was laid in February last, had cost them £2200. The funds which were gathered at the bazaar amounted to £1500; and there was a deficiency existing of £900, which he trusted their townsmen would help them to defray. Through the liberality of the late Miss Broadley, they had made advantageous terms for their parade-ground, the area of which was 8842 yards. The amount still required to purchase it was £1950. They had agreed to pay an annual rent of £80 for that land; but the North-Eastern Railway Company had given them a large portion of land at the nominal annual rent of £5. The noble chairman, before the close of the proceedings, offered a donation of £200 towards the building-fund. The distribution of prizes and badges to the successful marksmen in the late shooting-match took place after the dinner, Lady Londesborough giving the prizes away. The new barracks are most conveniently adapted for their purpose.

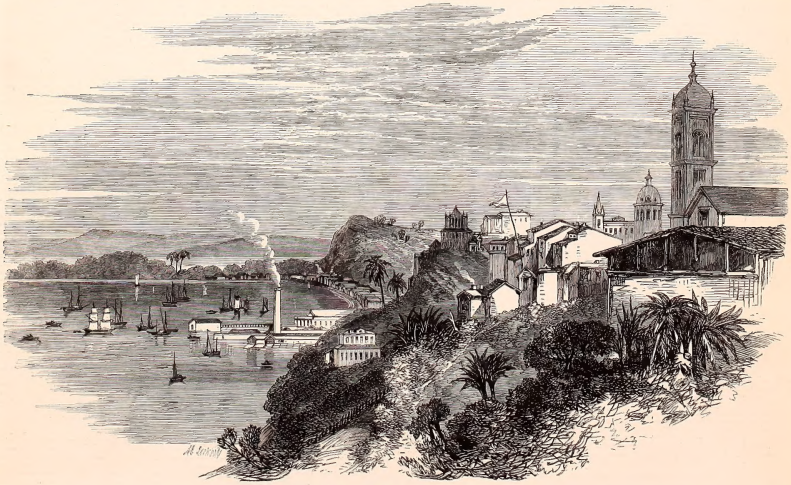
THE LATE OUTRAGE ON THE NEUTRALITY OF BRAZIL.



WACHUSETTS. THE BRAZILIAN WAR-SHIP. FLORIDA.

THE FLORIDA (CONFEDERATE) AND THE WACHUSETTS (FEDERAL) IN BAHIA HARBOUR.

OUR readers will not have forgotten the extraordinary action perpetrated by the Commander of a United States war-steamer, the Wachusetts, in the neutral harbour of Bahia, on the 7th ult., when an attack was suddenly made upon the steamer Florida, belonging to the navy of the Confederate States, and, after a few minutes' struggle with the few men who were on board, the Florida was audaciously carried away from beneath the protection of the Brazilian forts and ships of war. We are indebted to the Rev. C. G. Nicolay, English chaplain at Bahia, for the means of publishing an Illustration of this strange affair. One of our Engravings represents the position of the two American ships, with the Brazilian corvette lying between them, at the usual anchorage for men-of-war, previously to the hostile movement of the Wachusetts. This position is between Fort Gambos and Fort do Mar, and is unquestionably within the accustomed harbour.

Our second Engraving connected with this subject is a view of a part of the city of Bahia, as seen from the public gardens. The domed edifice shown on the right is the church of the Benedictine convent; the opera-house appears near the middle of the View; the arsenal, distinguished by a tall chimney, and the custom-house, with projecting pier, are seen below. Fort Gambos and the adjacent waters, in which the ships of war lay anchored, would be farther to the left hand.

ECHOES OF THE WEEK.

IF any one following on the track of Dr. Thompson, in his exploration of the "sensational" in literature, were to ask for the tap root of this gigantic growth, he might find it in that natural curiosity which attendeth the perpetration and perpetrators of all great crimes. Have not two big books, "Les Crimes Célèbres" and "Les Causes Célèbres," upon this absorbing topic, reached England from France, two amongst hundreds? Do not the "Newgate Calendar" and the "Annual" seven volumes of "State Trials" find their purchasers? and have we not had "Curiosities," and "Romances," and certain Chronicles of crime whereon, as from a reserve, the captains of fiction have drawn great materials into the field; and, lastly, have we not all during the last week been watching the last act of a murder-tragedy of such powerful interest? Again, were we not all more or less involved, nay, as much "overjoyed," as the newspapers had it, as good Dr. Watts himself, even when he sang "How blest" are the person, crying out, "Thank God he has reached Sydney." Yes, the cruel actor in this dire tragedy, who, by wickedness, force of character, accompany, stupidity, cunning, or what you will, had raised himself to the bad eminence he occupied, had moreover attained a certain mastery over the weaker minds by which he was surrounded, and had impressed them with an idea of his innocence. So in this "sensational novel," which we all read in the newspapers, the interest was wrought up to can point, and the culmination—the secret being well kept—only took place at the very last second of time. When, then, the final bell pealed forth the fact of the murderer's escape Time to Eternity, he muttered the words, "Ya, Ich habe es gethan"—"Yes, I did it," and that took a load from all our breasts. The law of the country was well, vigorously, and yet gently administered, and in the whole trial there is nothing of which England need feel ashamed. Nor, certainly, need anyone feel ashamed at the circumstance of such a great crime awakening "But for the grace of God, there goes Wm. Henry Palmer," as said that prayerful, sobering by a criminal.

In reference to this railway murder, the story of which has travelled over all America, Mr. Saba, in his letter from the Times, tells of the fascination of the railway, and the worst off as to travelling, though not carriages are isolated boxes, and there be little or no communication between them. In America you go to the opposite extreme, and as everybody knows, one can walk down the centre of a carriage containing a hundred or so of persons without the slightest inconvenience. Normality takes advantage even of this open-case travelling, and a gang of 200 ruffians, of the Erie Railroad, lately robbed and insulted every man, woman, and child in the train, and then quietly effected their escape. We may learn from this that convenience and safety in travelling are not to be attained by any plan, but that they are, as a rule, a body of experience always supposed them to do, in the middle of two systems. Saloon carriages are useful, carriages reserved for the unprotected females are indispensable also, and a communication so thorough outlook for the guard we must have; and this might be done with a little more manner placed in front of the train. Mr. Saba tells us why he turned, any signal from a carriage would catch his eye.

So we see there is no more security in life and limb than in the breath for Christmas. Talk about Pepper's ghost, there will not be the ghost of a "nice of ginger" left. The Temperance League, a mild name for the betrothed friends, have not ventured to put forward as the apparitions ever heard of by appearing, with the Lord Mayor at their head, for the Cup Final. If these be not the two parties to the next good eating, it should be in the City. Have not City feasts been famous, and were not marrow puddings and custard pies celebrated by the City's Laureate, Ben Jonson himself? Did not the Lord Mayor and his consort in Cheapside what time Henry V. entered in triumph after his French wars? And are not the halls of the companies renowned always for its particular "tap"—one for old port, the other for madeira, and so on? And with all these memories buzzing about the brain, because the mouth of the Lord is not the ever Lord Mayor's, and not addressed to the torch states the issue—the only issue with him—union or dismion. That is it. We must conquer or be conquered. We can negotiate only with the bayonet. We can have peace only by putting forth all our strength, crushing the Southern armies, and overthrowing the Southern Government." It was in July, 1864, that the writer and Colonel Jaques had audience of Mr. Davis, and peace seems still as distant as it was then.

Every Day Papers. By Andrew Halliday. (2 vols. Tinsley.) Some of these papers have already received the stamp of approbation in a very satisfactory manner, and one of them, called "My Account with her Majesty," has been remarkably honoured. Of it Mr. Halliday says, it "has been published, by permission of Mr. Charles Dickens, as a penny tract, and also in the British Workman;" by old port wine the writer was worthy of all praise, but its subject is a dangerous one to meddle with. Not only is our fable to fall into mysticism and its attendant extravagances, but one is tempted to enter upon an unauthorised exposition of the Almighty's intentions, and to arrive at conclusions from these observations that the writer is very mystical or very dogmatical; but there seems to be in the book an inclination to peer further into divine mysteries than appears sufficient in doing by the glimpses which have been vouchsafed to us by revelation. The guardianship of angels, the sympathy to us of the departed, the nature of heaven, the adolescence of children after death, and kindred matters are topics which, in our humble opinion, it were better to treasure up in the heart with holy and silent hopefulness, than to make the subjects of discussion and speculation, however comfortable and engaging a theory it may be possible to establish.

The Master of Marton. (3 vols. Hurst and Blackett.) It is not often that one fails in with a story so nicely written, so true to nature in its descriptions of scenery and character, so free from errors in its reflection of those deep feelings the current of which is still in proportion to the depth at the bottom. Mr. Hurst appears to have left upon the memory of all who are acquainted with Mr. Trollope's sweet characters, Lily Dale, Dorothea.

Crosse Island. By J. Ross Browne. (1 vol. Sampson Low, Son, and Marston.) A profusely illustrated book of travel and adventure, anecdote and autobiography. The "narrative dates as far back as the early part of the year 1849," and the last date in the book is, so far as we remember, January, 1864, so that the reviewer may expect to find the experiences of at least twelve years' rough life recorded. There is a great deal of entertainment in the narrative of the life of Fernandez, California, and Washoe; but the title seems to be a misnomer, except that the author remarks (p. 160) "that Robinson Crusoe was not wrecked on the island of Juan Fernandez. In all probability he never saw that island.

Lucretia; or, Thoughtful to Excess. By William Allingham. (1 vol. Macmillan and Co.) A poem in twelve chapters of rhyming tens is a singular mode whereby to present a numerously real fashionable social and political, upon "every-day Irish affairs;" nevertheless, the author has managed to display considerable poetical exercition in the performance of a difficult task. There is also a lack of graphic and elegant description; there is good store of generous sentiment; and there is humour, not unmarred by the use of one of the most common Irish phraseology.

Essentials of Spelling. By E. Jones, B.A. (1 vol. F. Pitman.) Although it is no longer "a way we have in the army" to spell "struggle" with three "gs," correct spelling has by no means attained universal adoption. Spelling is the handmaid of spelling; the practice of eye in reading, of ear in hearing, of hand in writing, and of voice in speaking, is the proper nourishment of memory, and the fact Mr. Jones is fully alive; his little book is wrought with due regard thereto, and when we state that the manual has received the commendation of Professor Max Müller, it will be acknowledged that it has no need of commendation from us.

MUSIC.

The operatic proceedings at our town great theatres are barren of interest. At Covent Garden Mr. Harrison's "Revelry" continues to draw good houses; and the same thing may be said of Gounod's "Faust," at Her Majesty's Theatre, where little more activity in the production of novelty would be desirable at both houses.

M. Aguilar's third matinée of pianoforte music took place at his house on Thursday week, and was numerously and fashionably attended, as usual. The programme, besides masterpieces of Beethoven, Field, Mendelssohn, and Chopin, included several of Mr. Aguilar's compositions, particularly his Sonata in G, "The Last Rose of Summer," "The Birds at Sunset," and "La Danse des Lutins," all of which excited much interest. He was assisted by Miss Aguilar, his daughter, a young pianist of the highest promise.

St. Martin's Hall, in Long-acre, so well known to the musical world during its occupancy by Mr. Hullah, has now been closed to the public ever since the disastrous fire about four years ago, is about to be reopened as a concert-room, under which it was originally built—the teaching of elementary singing classes—under the direction of Mr. Constantine. This gentleman was associated with Mr. Hullah for many years, and, in connection with Mr. Hullah's retirement from public teaching, succeeded him in the directorship of the classes, both elementary and advanced, then carried on at the Music Hall in Store-street. Mr. Constantine personally pre-eminently best known in his "Penny Readings."

The London Choral Union, on Thursday evening, the 10th inst., gave a complimentary benefit concert, at the Hanover-square Rooms, to Mr. W. R. Adams, the able accompanist to the Union. The concert was in all respects an admirable entertainment, and attracted a large and highly musical audience. The selection, among other excellent works, included the whole of Benedict's cantata, "Undine," composed for and first produced at the Norwich Musical Festival, and here performed by Miss Banks, Mr. Gryffyd, Mr. Palmer Leslie, and Mr. L. Thomas; Schubert's celebrated song, "The Wanderer," sung by Mr. Thomas; Goumbel's favourite quartet, "Les Kermesse," from "Faust;" Sterndale Bennett's fine trio from "The May Queen," sung by Miss Eliza Hughes, Mr. Montem Smith, and Mr. Thomas; and a new composition of much interest, the 121st Psalm, by H. Matthison-Hawsen, organist of the cathedral of Roskilde, in Denmark, performed for the first time in this country by Mr. Adams performed Mendelssohn's "Andante and Rondo Capriccioso," showing himself to be a pianist of very high order; Mr. Gryffyd's song, "The Dream," and a masterly part-song, "The Brooklet," both from his pen, among the most attractive features of the concert. The forenerwas sung by Mr. Montem Smith with great taste and feeling, and the latter by the members of the society with much delicacy and effect, and both were warmly applauded. Altogether, the concert was as successful as it was excellent.

The Dusseldorf journals, in their notices of the concerts of the Instrumental-Verein of that city, speak in high terms of two works by our countryman Mr. W. G. Cusins—his overture to "King Lear" and his scherzo entitled "Queen Mab." In regard to the former, we quote from the Dusseldorf Zeitung the following passage, which contains in few words a sound view of an important critical question:—"The concert of the Instrumental-Verein last evening introduced to us two new and interesting compositions by a young English musician, Mr. Cusins, private organist to the Queen of England. The greater and more important of these is an overture to 'King Lear,' which evinces a decided talent for orchestral writing. Mr. Cusins understands the instruments and avails himself of their properties in an able and effective manner. The melodies are often happy, but do not exhibit absolute originality. Perhaps, wishing it, or being even conscious of it, the composer leans towards previously known forms. He does not copy them, but writes in their spirit; and, under the aspect of his unities, the features of some good old friend shine forth. Mr. Cusins, however, is young, and, keeping in more lateful than forced originality, and it is better a thousand times to follow tradition than to strain after originality by unnatural means. True originality soon works itself to the front; and, to quote a great example, ought we to reproach the illustrious Beethoven for having in his pianoforte-sonatas written passages in the style of father Haydn? Mr. Cusins possesses decided talent, and the numerous musical friends he has gained for himself by the genial excellent performance of our Instrumental-Verein, will concern heartily in the care of the foreign visitor." The success of this overture has been equally great in London, and in this country, to bring it forward at one of the earliest Sunday Popular Concerts.

Mr. Balfe has left London for Paris, where he is to spend the winter.

Mdlle. Lucca, whose abrupt departure from London last season excited so much surprise, has made her debut at the Royal Italian Opera, has entered into a re-engagement with Mr. Lye for next season.

Mr. Meredict, who is a native of Stutgard, has received from the King of Wirtemberg the decoration of the Grand Order of the Crown, an honour rarely bestowed and highly prized.

THE THEATRES.

A new comedietta, entitled "The Wilful Ward," was produced at the Haymarket on Monday. It is from the pen of J. P. Wooler, and is evidently intended to show the talents of the new actress, Miss Palmer, in an original character. The young lady has to get rid of a lover, and to liberate her guardian, who appears in love in vain. Her guardian insists and her lover persists. She then makes the removal of her entire's acquaintance a condition of her compliance. He refuses of course, and the capricious beauty triumphs. Mr. Turner and Mr. Belford, as the father and the fop, greatly aided the heroine in her efforts to please, and the new drama was received much laughter.

An original musical drama has been produced at the St. James's. It is entitled "The Gipsy Countess; or, the Child of Prima Donna." The Baronet is represented by Mr. Frank Matthews, and the Prima Donna by Mrs Roden, who has been especially engaged for the occasion. The plot illustrates the old theme of the gipsy countess, is from the pen of Mr. Lennox Horne, the author of "Two Heads Are Better Than One," which really produced the Christmas fun in the story of Normandy, where Sir Cliff Green lives in a retired manner, as the friend of a widow lady and her child, Leap Gaure (Mr. Johnstone), is a smuggler. Having determined on a marriage with Gaure, Garou provides him with a servant in the person of Suzette, the daughter of the old innkeeper, who is a great rogue and a thief. She imbibes the employment, and seeks to disgust her master by perpetually stopping. She is, however, a most accomplished and agreeable she, of course, prefers. Accordingly, she replies to all Sir Fitful's questions in music, treating him to snatches of song from the great masters, including Mr. Oscar Barrett, Weber, Balfe, and Verdi, with which he is so far from being pleased that he dismisses her in a fury. Mr. Horne's plot is full of incidents, and there is much variety of action, and prevents the assassination. The smuggler has contrived a mechanical trap-door in the floor of his victims; the top of the bed descends and crushes them while they sleep. To avert a nervous suspicion, Garou places a phial of laudanum by the bedside. The trick is found out by the accomplished Suzette, and the assassination is descending. Miss Roden, though yet in her novitiate, showed much talent. She has a good voice and a pleasing style. Mr. Horne's new composition by Virginia Gabriel is introduced into the action, and obtained an encore; while a finale supplied by Mr. Ernest Gaston, in which Miss Roden is assisted by a chorus, proved effective.

Mr. Boucicault, we find, has produced a new Irish drama, entitled "Arrah-na-Pogue; or, the Wicklow Wedding," which has been performed in Dublin, at the Theatre Royal, "with much go" in a great style, the scenery painted by Mr. Lloyd, and the dances arranged by Mr. Oscar Barrett. The parts are sustained by Mr. Emery, Mr. John Brougham, and Mrs. Buckingham White, as well as Mr. and Mrs. Boucicault themselves. The piece is decidedly Irish in story, as we have seen it stated, appears to be full of interest; but we must await its performance in London before committing ourselves to an opinion on its merits.

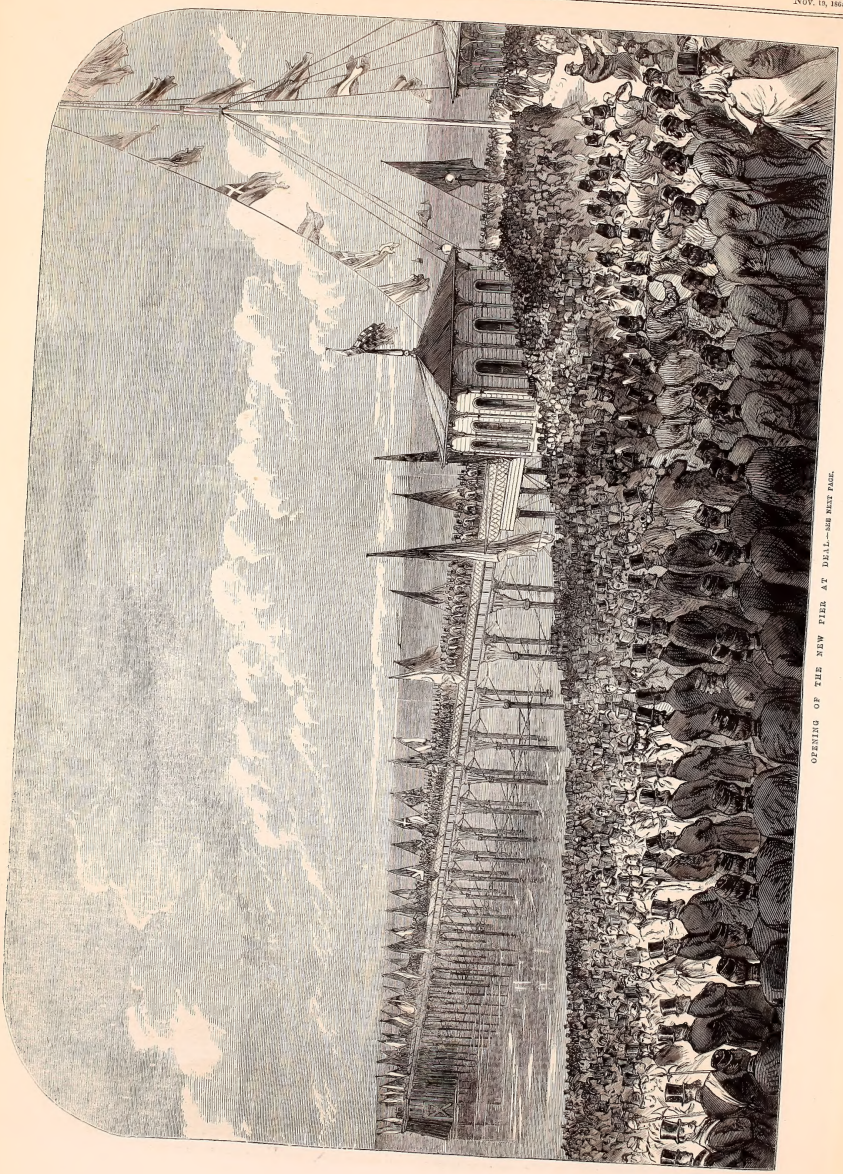
The Government emigrant-ship Hannah More, 1129 tons, belonging to Messrs. T. M. Mackay and Co., London, sailed from Birkenhead on the 13th inst., with 1000 passengers, chiefly emigrants, under the care of Mr. J. C. Sangar, M.D., surgeon superintendent.



An Egyptian Government Loan is announced for £3,704,200 5 per cents, issued at 80, and redeemable in fifteen years by October 1st. It is authorised by the Sultan, and is redeemable in fifteen years by drawings of £100 bonds, commencing in January, 1866.

General Garibaldi has accepted the yacht Princess Olga, presented to him by certain friends in England and Scotland. The Princess Olga sailed from Cowes on the 12th inst., and arrived at Spezzia, the Peninsula Steam boats from Gibraltar, on the 8th inst., she sailed the next morning for Cagrera.

The National Life-boat Institution has forwarded a new lifeboat, the gift of a lady, to Aldeburgh, Suffolk. The sum contributed, amounting to £289, has been defrayed by a lady resident in Berkshire. All the life-boats, twenty-seven in number, on the coast of Suffolk, belong to the Life-boat Institution.

On the night of the 8th inst, a terrible storm burst on the Prussian coast in the Baltic, and also raged far out at sea. Accounts from all the ports along the coast state that no appalling destruction was caused by the overflow of the sea into the streets and houses, and by the washing away of the land. Numerous vessels were stranded, and others received much injury, but the loss of life was not great.

The great festival which is celebrated at Bristol on the natal day of Colston, the old and well-known philanthropist of Bristol, was celebrated on Monday. The principal societies which drew together are the Merchant Venturers' Society, and the Bristolian Society, and they were rendered additionally interesting by the presence of Mr. Berkeley, one of the representatives of the city, who came in his coach and four to the place of Mr. Langton, who will retire at the next election in consequence of ill health. Among the company were the Archdeacon of Bristol, Mr. Hare, Mr. Hartnoll, Mr. Hare, Mr. Hartnoll, and Mr. Hare, Mr. Hartnoll, and Mr. Hare, Mr. Hartnoll, and

MEMORIAL CHURCH AT FUTTEYGURH, INDIA.

MEMORIAL CHURCH AT FUTTEYGURH, INDIA.

FUTTEYGURH is a station in the North-Western Provinces of India, distant about eighty miles from Cawnpore, and, like Cawnpore in the time of the Sepoy mutiny of 1857, it fell into the hands of the rebels, when nearly every European in the station was slaughtered. The bodies of many of our unfortunate countrymen were thrown into a well, over which a monument has been erected by the Government of the North-Western Provinces. The church, represented by our Engraving, is built within a stone's cast of the well, and forms one of the most conspicuous objects at the station. This church was consecrated on Sunday, Feb. 15, 1863, by the Lord Bishop of Calcutta. It received the name of All Souls' Church, by which it was designed to keep in memory the circumstance of its erection and the memory of those victims of the massacre of 1857 whose bodies lie so near the church. It holds about 300 people, and has the advantage of being contiguous to the soldiers' barracks. The present Chaplain is the Rev. E. Templeman, late of Pembroke College, Oxford.

ST. THOMAS'S SCHOOL, HOWRAH, CALCUTTA.

THE town of Howrah, situated on the west bank of the river Hooghly, opposite Calcutta, is the terminus of the great East Indian Railway, which is now open from Calcutta to Delhi, a distance of about 1000 miles. At Howrah, too, are situated the principal docks, in which the numerous ships in the port are received and repaired. There are several other large industrial establishments, such as iron foundries, flour-mills, rope-factories, distilleries, cotton-screws, coal-depôts, and salt-warehouses, in addition to the extensive workshops for the erection and repair of railway locomotive engines and carriages. To superintend and carry on these various establishments a considerable number of European artisans and engineers are employed, and the Anglo-Indian population of Howrah has been variously estimated at from 800 to 1000. It is the custom in India for the higher classes of the civil and military officers of Government, as well as for the more wealthy members of the mercantile community, to send their children to England for education as soon as they are of a proper age; but, as this system is a highly expensive one, it is evident that the middle and lower classes of English and East Indian parents must have their children educated in India, if at all. When the able and zealous prelate, Dr. Cotton (formerly Head Master of Marlborough School), who now rules over the diocese of Calcutta, was first appointed to that see, in 1858, one of his earliest cares was to organise a scheme of education for the children of those English and East Indian parents who were not able to afford the expense of sending them to the hills or to Europe for their education. St. Thomas's School, Howrah, which was opened by the Bishop of Calcutta on the 11th of August last, is one of the earliest fruits of Bishop Cotton's Anglo-Indian educational scheme. The building as it stands, including the sum of 8000 rupees (£800), the cost of the site, has cost altogether 33,000 rupees (£3300). Half this sum was raised by public subscription, and principally from the profits of a fancy bazaar which was held on the Howrah Green, on New-Year's Day, 1863; the other half was contributed by Government. The building is a handsome edifice in the Elizabethan style, and is pleasantly situated opposite the Howrah Green, on the Grand Trunk road. It consists of two large school-rooms—one above and one below, for girls and boys respectively, each 60ft. long by 25ft. broad, with smaller rooms at the back for the residence of the teachers, and a verandah in front. The school, which has hitherto, since its establishment in 1861 by the Chaplain (the Rev. W. Spencer), been held in rooms hired for the purpose, has generally an average of about fifty children under instruction. The school is supported partly by public subscription, partly by school fees, and partly by a Government grant in aid. The schoolmaster was himself educated in Bishop's College, Calcutta, and the schoolmistress has lately been sent out from England. The entire school is under the superintendence of the Chaplain of Howrah.

THE NEW PIER AT DEAL.

WE present a View of the opening of the New Pier at Deal on Tuesday week. There was a great concourse of spectators around the flagstaff at the pier-head to witness this ceremony, which was performed by Mrs. Hogessan, wife of the borough member, who had himself, in April, 1863, inaugurated the commencement of the work. The lady took her seat in a chair which was placed on a truck and drawn along the tramway to the end of the pier. She then declared the pier opened, and congratulated the Deal and Walmer Pier Company, as well as the town of Deal, upon the completion of this useful structure.

LAYING THE FOUNDATION-STONE OF BREAN DOWN BREAKWATER, WESTON-SUPER-MARE.—SEE NEXT PAGE

There was afterwards a banquet at the New Assembly Room. Mr. John Attwell, chairman of the company, presided; and among the guests were Mr. Clarence Paget, the Secretary to the Admiralty, besides the county and borough members. Lord Clarence Paget highly commended the erection of the pier to give a readier access to the shore from the Downs—rendered, and hinted that if the charges were not too exorbitant the Government might be disposed to use the Deal pier for the embarkation of troops. It is expected that this accommodation will induce many persons to land on Deal from passing steamers up the Channel. The pier was designed by Mr. Eugenius Birch, engineer of the pier at Blackpool. It has been constructed, under his superintendence, in a most satisfactory manner, by Messrs. R. Lander, contractors, of Glasgow. The pier is constructed of wrought and cast iron, and is supported upon cast-iron columns, which are screwed into the ground to the depth of 11ft., long and 22ft. wide, and runs into 10 ft. water at low-water spring tides. It has also a promenade along its entire length, and in the centre is a tramway for conveying goods and luggage, while ample means are provided for landing and embarking at any part.

BREAM DOWN HARBOUR, IN THE BRISTOL CHANNEL.

The foundation-stone of the proposed breakwater of Bream Down Harbour, Weston-super-Mare, was laid, as we mentioned last week, on Saturday, the 12th inst., by Lady Hannah Wilmot, wife of Sir J. Eardley Wilmot, the chairman of the Bream Down Harbour Company. We have engraved a View of the scene at the moment when the stone was lowered from the little steam-boat the Wye, on board which a company of about two hundred ladies and gentlemen were assembled. The immersion of this stone took place at a distance of some hundred yards from the shore, in about 70ft. of water. It was received with loud cheering by a multitude of people on land, as well as by those afloat in the numerous boats which hovered around. Flags were hoisted, a salute of cannon was fired, and a band of music on board the Wye struck up a triumphant strain. Lady Eardley Wilmot then read an appropriate address, and the stone was left on the bottom by the opening of valves in its base. The steam-boat cruised for an hour along the coast between the western end of Bream Down and the old Steep Holm pier, after which its passengers were landed at Weston-super-Mare. An elegant déjeuner was served in the Townhall, where toasts were drunk and speeches were delivered congratulating the promoters of this enterprise upon its favourable commencement than morning. The result of a hydrographical survey of not of a commercial port and packet station in this part of the Bristol Channel has long been acknowledged. The site of Bream Down Harbour seems to be well adapted for the purpose. It is sheltered by a vast natural promontory stretching a mile and a half into the sea, and has never less than three fathoms of water at low spring tides. The Government have announced their intention to erect a powerful battery of artillery on Bream Down, which, combined with fortifications on the Steep and Flat Holms, which are about three miles distant; and these, with a battery at Lavernock, on the Welsh coast, will effectually protect the entrance to the Severn.

VICTORIA.

MELBOURNE, Sept. 26.—The European July mails were delivered in Melbourne from Suez on the 19th instant, and reached Sydney Harbour having arrived in Hobson's Bay on the 8th inst.

We are not blessed of a general election day, notwithstanding the universality of the suffrage, the event causes the least possible excitement. The newspapers are fuller than usual of advertisements, and meanwhile business is suspended and the candidates left to be severally advantageously filled. Beyond this there is nothing to mark the political crisis. The nominations for the first batch of electors took place on the 22nd inst., and already six members to the new Parliament have been returned, the Chief Secretary (Mr. M'Culloch) being one of the successful candidates. The existing Ministry have every reactor and ability to recommend them; but their policy, especially upon the question, is so vague as to render it difficult to gauge where there is every probability of their meeting the House with a majority of supporters, but the Ballot Act the time of which is now at hand will soon determine. The bulk of the members of the defunct Parliament are candidates for fresh Legislative honours—a circumstance that leads to the supposition that politics, directly or indirectly, are not the paying game, especially when it is borne in mind that not a few of the aspirants to membership in the Assembly the Stephens-ward are shilling to bless themselves with.

The final answer of Mr. Carthwell to our oft-repeated remonstrances against the continuance of the infliction of the curse of convictism upon us has but stimulated the anti-transportation movement. Meetings, at which heavy-worded resolutions have been passed, have been held all over the country; and in Ballarat, the most important of our gold-fields township, a wonderful petition to the Queen on the subject has been numerously signed. In Melbourne a number of influential and wealthy gentlemen have formed themselves into a society, the object of which is to pay the passage to England of such expired convicts as choose to avail themselves of this chance of returning. The society has undertaken to raise £4000 a year for that object; and I am in a position to state that, already, some villains of the worst description have been assisted homewards with the funds of the association, and that its staff of officers and workers are actively engaged in full swing. The existence and operations of such a society may be the cause of unwise; but it will, nevertheless, be well to state the fact.

The misunderstanding between Victoria and New South Wales on the question of border customs has aroused a serious aspect, so much so that, were we independent nations instead of being, as we are, offshoots of Britain, we should at once resume hostilities and commence all the excitement of an international warfare. Blows have not actually been struck, but countless very little items of black mail money has been accomplished. The matter is in a nutshell; but, simple and easily settled as it may be, the responsibility is that I have not to be referred to the Privy Council for decision. New South Wales claims the power of interrupting Victorian commerce on the river Murray, although the vessels employed may be Victorian, and although every one Victorian port to another, with goods on board for which duties have been paid to the Victorian Government. This claim will not, of course, be conceded by this colony, which has a staff of officers on the scene to protect its interests. Since the appearance of a few really effective Victorian policemen on its borders, New South Wales has, it is said, somewhat modified its tone; so that, after all, the affair may end in a friendly and triumphant fizzle.

A house has at length been found for the young salmon in a tributary of the Yarra, about forty miles from Melbourne, and is now prepared for the conveyance of the young fishes from town to their new abode; and, although the road is one of the roughest imaginable, under the care of the superintendent of the Government Gardens, strangers were safely lodged in the stream, where, it is to be hoped, after escaping the dangers of the way, they will be left to grow to maturity. So far the experiment has been an eminent success.

The Legislature arrived the other day with the assortment of birds, hares, &c., for the Acclimatisation Society. The importation includes seven nightingales—a present from Miss Burdett Coutts.

The numerous trouble-hunt movements taken deep root in and about Melbourne, there having been established within the last few months a considerable number of these useful institutions.

Miss Grace Egerton (Mrs. Case) and her husband have been very successful with their entertainments termed "A Drawing-room to Let." Every night the Polytechnic Institution, where the entertainment is given, is filled to overflowing. Lady Don continues to attract large houses at the Haymarket; and the Royal is always tolerably well filled.

Never, perhaps, were the mining prospects of the colony in a healthier state than they are at present. Confidence on the part of capitalists seems to have revived—large amounts being now readily invested in this description of enterprise.

SOUTH AUSTRALIA.

ADELAIDE, Sept. 26.—Government have been defeated on their policy on the pastoral lessee question by a majority of six. When the valuation of the runs is completed, which will not be before January next, the reconsideration of the matter will be attempted in another shape.

The cereal exports from this colony from the beginning of the year till the present time are double in value what they were during the corresponding period of last year, the total value for this year being £1,261,274.

The returns from the copper-mines continue very satisfactory.

NEW SOUTH WALES.

SYDNEY, Sept. 26.—The commercial and other news from this colony is unimportant. The Queen Victoria left for Europe, takes with her 149,841 sovereigns and 2348 ounces of gold.

Tenders have been accepted for the completion of Denison Viaduct.

The construction of a railway from Macquarie River to Bulli, in order to open up a new coal district, has been discussed and urged upon the Government.

QUEENSLAND.

Mr. Jordan, the Immigration Commissioner, proceeds to England by the outgoing mail, to resume his duties as agent-general for Queensland.

The Peak Down mining news is reported as encouraging; but, in the absence of positive results, little reliance can be placed upon the mining intelligence from the remote regions of Queensland.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS.

THE EARL OF STAIR.

The Right Hon. Sir North Hamilton Dalrymple, ninth Earl of Stair, Viscount of Stair and Dalrymple, Lord Newliston, Glenluce, and Stranraer, in the Peerage of Scotland, Baronet of Cousland, in the Baronetage of Nova Scotia, and Baronet of Kingsmuir, and a Lord of Session, by the title of Lord Dalrymple, died on the 11th inst., at his family residence, Lochinch Castle, Wigtonshire, aged 75.

Dalrymple, Bart., fourth Baronet of Cousland, a Baron of the Exchequer in Scotland, and author of "Memoirs of Great Britain and Ireland." He was born in 1776, and succeeded his father as a Baronet of Nova Scotia. Mr. North Dalrymple, of Forfar, and was popular as taking an active part in connection with the Scottish Reform movement, which successfully contested, in 1832, by his elder brother, Sir John Dalrymple, subsequently created Earl of Stair. He was himself M.P. for Wigtonshire, and was remarkable for his amiability, for his faithfulness to party, and his attachment to the Scottish Church, and for his many services rendered to Scotland, and was the largest landowner in Midlothian, if not in Wigtonshire, besides his large possessions in Ayrshire, Berwickshire, and other properties in Ayrshire and Lanarkshire. He succeeded to the family honours on the demise of his elder brother, John Hamilton, fifth Earl of Stair, on the 29th Jan., 10, 1835. His Lordship married, first, in 1817, Margaret, youngest daughter of James Penny, Esq., of Arthur, by whom he had issue, one son and her (who died April 22, 1828), had a son, his successor, and four daughters, three of whom survive him—namely, Lady Anne Hay-Newton, Lady Agnes Nisbett, and Lady Margaret Penny Macomochie-Welwood of Garwoch. The Hon. Francis Henry Dalrymple, the second son of the late Viscount Stair, Dalrymple, by whom he had another son, the Hon. George Grey Dalrymple. The Earl's three married sisters, Lady Dalrymple, Lady Ann Hay, and Lady Sandys, Esq., of Graythwaite Hall, in the county of Lancaster, and left six sons and five daughters; Jane, who was wife of William Dalrymple, and left a son, the Right Hon. William Horsman, M.P., and a daughter, Mary Jane, married to Edward Sandys, Esq., of Graythwaite Hall, and Captain and Sergeant-at-Law; and Martha, who was wife of Lieutenant Thomas Simpson, who was killed at the capture of Acre in 1811, and left a daughter and heir, Elizabeth, and a son, Vincent Dalrymple, M.P., Lord Lieutenant of Wigtonshire, now Earl of Stair, who succeeds to the title of the United Kingdom, gives the Earls of Stair a seat in the House of Lords.

HUDSON GURNEY, ESQ.

Hudson Gurney, Esq., of Keswick, in the county of Norfolk, the head and representative of the ancient and time-honoured family of Gurney, who died, on the 8th inst., at his residence, Keswick Hall, near Norwich, in his seventy-first year, was a gentleman of great ability and a princely disposition, being a munificent patron of the fine arts, a liberal supporter of many charitable institutions in Norfolk, but had for some time suffered from a severe illness, which at last proved fatal.

He was the elder son of the only son by his first wife, (who died in childbirth), of Richard Gurney, Esq., of Bishopsgate, Sheriff of London in 1784, and Alderman of the City, and Lord Mayor in 1792. He was elected M.P. for Shaftesbury in 1812, and for Newtown, Hants, in 1818, and sat in three successive Parliaments. He was High Sheriff of Norfolk in 1825. He was a member of the Society of the Friends, or Quakers, and his opinion was especially valued in matters relating to the law of real property, his estates of inheritance, Mr. Gurney is said to have possessed a fortune exceeding £300,000. He was also a contributor to the great brewing firm of Barclay and Perkins). Mr. Gurney through his connection with Norwich, formed a friendship with Mr. Fox, who was for any reasonable purpose of charity were seldom, if ever, unattended to. The late Mr. Gurney was a man of great benevolence, and his charities were incalculable. His death will cause a void, in his own district particularly, which will be very difficult to fill up, and which deeply affects his family. He also a patron of letters and the fine arts; and he himself was known as an author of no mean ability. His principal work was a book of "Meditations," published a poem, under the title of "Cupid and Psyche," which was based on the celebrated fable of Apuleius, which appeared in Blackwood's Magazine. Mr. Gurney married, in 1809, Margaret, daughter of Robert Barclay, Esq., of Youngsbury, Herts, by whom he had issue. Mr. Gurney's eldest son, Russell Gurney, Esq., M.P., Recorder of Brighton, and a Bencher of Lincoln's Inn, and is married to a daughter of James Allardice, Esq., of Allardice, and heiress of line to the Earls of Kintyre and Argyll. Mr. Gurney's second son, Hudson Gurney, married his cousin Elizabeth Gurney, daughter of Samuel Gurney, Esq., of Upton, Essex, to whom belonged Mrs. Fry, so justly celebrated for her active benevolence and her valuable exertions in the cause of prison reform.

THE RIGHT HON. THOMAS ERSKINE.

The Right Hon. Thomas Erskine, Baron Erskine of Restormel Castle, Lord Lieutenant of the Duchy of Cornwall, Vice-Admiral of the Duchy of Cornwall, and Governor of Dartmoor Prison, died on the 17th inst., at Restormel Castle, Lostwithiel, Cornwall, aged 76. He was the second son of the late Thomas Erskine, Esq., of Linlathen, Forfarshire, by Frances Anne, daughter of Henry Hoare, Esq., of Hampton Court Palace, and was born on March 12, 1788, and was educated at Harrow School, and at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he graduated M.A. in 1811. He was called to the Bar by the Hon. Society of Lincoln's Inn in 1813, and was advanced to the rank of King's Counsel in 1827; and four years afterwards he was appointed Chief Judge of the Court of Review in Bankruptcy, and return of the Privy Council. In 1839 he was made a Serjeant-at-Law and a Judge of the Court of Common Pleas. His health compelled him to resign his judgeship in 1846. He was also a Commissioner of the Duchy of Cornwall. The right hon. gentleman married, Dec. 10, 1818, Henrietta Eliza, only daughter of Henry Trail, Esq., by whom he had issue the late Hon. Amelia Anne Trail Erskine, Henry Trail Erskine, Esq., and the Rev. Thomas Erskine, Rector of Steppingley, Beds. The Right Hon. Thomas Erskine died on the 9th inst., at Borrowdale.

ADMIRAL THE HON. SIR MONTAGU STOPFORD, K.C.B.

The Hon. Sir Montagu Stopford, K.C.B., as Admiral, R.N., who died at Edinburgh, on the 10th inst., after a protracted illness, was the fourth son of George, third Earl of Courtown, by his wife, Lady Mary Scott, eldest daughter of Henry, third Duke of Buccleuch, and was uncle of James George Henry, fifth and present Earl of Courtown. He was born on Nov. 11, 1788, and entered the Royal Navy in 1810, on board the flag-ship of his uncle, the late Admiral Sir Robert Stopford, then the naval Commander-in-Chief at the Cape of Good Hope, and the Admiral's younger son was present at the capture of Java. After being employed in various ships, he joined the Alceste, Captain Murray Maxwell, which conveyed Lord Amherst on his embassy to China, and he was wrecked in that ship in the Strait of Gaspar on his passage home, in 1817. The late command he held was on the Jamaica station, in the East Indies and American and West India stations, from 1842 until she was paid off in 1846. For nearly four years he was Admiral-Superintendent at Sheerness Dockyard. At the end of 1853, he was appointed Admiral-Superintendent at Malta, and took part in the war against Russia in the Black Sea. In 1854 he was made a Companion of the Bath, and in 1855 was promoted to be Rear-Admiral of the Blue. He became Rear-Admiral in 1858, a Vice-Admiral in 1858, and an Admiral, Nov. 26, 1863. Admiral Stopford (who first, Aug. 29, 1827, Caroline, second daughter of General Sir Henry Whitmore, K.C.H., and by her (who died in 1834) had two sons, the elder of whom, Lieut. George Montagu Stopford, R.E., Knight of the Medjidie, died in 1868, and three daughters—Mary, wife of Lieutenant-Colonel Adye, R.A., C.B., Caroline, wife of Captain Nixon, Rifle Brigade; and Annette, wife of her cousin, Captain Stopford. The Admiral married, secondly, Sept. 30, 1835, Lucy, youngest daughter of John Kay, Esq., of the North Charlton, Northumberland, and leaves issue also by her second wife two daughters.

 A Notice and Portrait will be given next week of the eminent political economist Mr. M'Culloch, just deceased.

WILLS AND BEQUESTS.

The will of the Rev. John Thomas Howe Le Mesurier, M.A., late Archdeacon of Malta, was proved in the London Court on the 24th ult., and the personal effects sworn under £12,000, the executors and trustees nominated being his cousin, the Rev. John Le Mesurier, M.A., perpetual Curate of Brenchley, in Kent, and together with the testator's sister, Miss Marion Octavia Le Mesurier, and the Rev. David Morton, Rural Dean and Incumbent of Hornchurch, Essex, Chaplain to Lord Petre. The testator was formerly Chaplain to the Forces, and previously of Beaumont College, Old, and Saint Mary's College, Oscott, and died at Malta on the 28th of last month at Benbridge on the 19th of September last. After making several bequests, the testator left the residue of his property to his said sister Marion, whom he also appointed residuary legatee. The state which he inherited from his father and grandfather, and from his uncle and godfather, Sir John Thomas Duckworth, frequenting Dockyard Chapel, Malta, also the silver epergne presented to him by the Captain Society in the East Indies, and of his ordinary wear, and the library by his said sister during her life, and then given over to his said cousin John Le Mesurier, to whom he also bequeathed his gold chain which he wore as King's College, London. To his brother-in-law, John Leefhum, of Beenes Farm, Isle of Wight, he left £1000, and a legacy of £2000 in trust thereof for his life and the principal to his children. To the following seven institutions he bequeathed £1000 each, to be paid together with the interest, the Societies for the Propagation of the Gospel, the Foreign Parts, for the Promotion of Christian Knowledge, for Building and Enlarging Churches, for the Additional Curates Aid Society, the Clergy Orphan Society, and the Church Pastoral Aid Society, at the end of the first year after the death of the testator.

The will of General Sir James Hervey Reynolds, K.C.B., K.C.H., late of 62, Eaton-square, formerly of Brunswick-terrace, Brighton, was proved in London, on the 7th inst., by the executors, Sir John Kirkland, of Devonshire-square, and James Campbell, Esq., of Hampton Court. The gallant and distinguished military officer was formerly Her Majesty's Lieut.-Governor of Jersey. He died at Hampton Court Palace, on the 9th of August last, at the advanced age of 90 years. He was married in 1804. His wife, Lady Reynolds, having a provision under marriage settlement, he left the whole of his property, real and personal, having little less than that of about £80 per annum to a sister and a friend to Ashworth Dorset.

The will of Mr. Thomas Ashworth, late of Barmoor Castle, Northumberland, was proved in London by the acting executor, William H. Sitwell, Esq., the brother, power being reserved to the testator's widow, Frances Elizabeth Ashworth, and to Mr. Sitwell, son of the said William H. Sitwell, also an executor, to prove hereafter. The personal estate of the deceased was sworn under £120,000, and the real at £7000 per annum, which was attested by John Cowell and Hugh Hope, both of Barmoor, Farmers-street, Wardour-street, Soho, and by Mr. Sitwell. By the will the whole of his property, having expressly bequeathed to his wife the furniture of Barmoor Castle, and all and singular, together with the landed estates at Barmoor and at Yeavering, both in the county of Northumberland.

The following particulars of a number of bequests which have fallen to the local charities of Arbroath and Dundee:—By the will of the late Mrs. Elizabeth Johnston and Mr. Wylie, To the Dale Cottage Industrial School Mr. Johnston has left £1000; to the Arbroath Infirmary, £1000; to the Female Benevolent School, Park-street, £200; to the Abbey Charity School, £100; to the Arbroath Subscription Library, £50. Besides these bequests to local institutions himself, these made by his deceased wife now come into force. The largest of them is a bequest of £2100 to a fund, to be called the Lucy Fund, for the benefit of decayed widows or old unmarried females in the town of Arbroath. To this legacy Mr. Johnston has added a bequest of a similar sum of £2100, making in all £4000 as the Forbes Fund. Mrs. Johnston has also left:—To the Arbroath Infirmary, £200; Female Benevolent School, £200; Abbey Charity, £100; Dale Cottage School, £200; Dundee Infirmary, £100; Bodowan Lodging-House, £100; Dundee Orphan Institution, £100; Dundee Asylum, £100. The legacies to Arbroath amount to £6000, and to Dundee £1000. The whole are payable on Whit Sunday next.

SCIENTIFIC NEWS.

THE PHOSPHORESCENT LIGHT OF THE CUCUTOS.—A correspondent draws our attention to the habits of the family of Elaterides, mentioned in the interesting report of America—has been examined by Mr. Pasteur, of the Normal School, and by Professor Pace of the Abbé Moigno, at the request of the Cosmos. The Messieurs ladies use those insects for ornamental purposes, fixing them in their hair, and putting them under veils, as one of our ladies a day. The light processing from the two small bodies on the thorax's head is only the result of rubbing of the two parts against each other. M. Pasteur has reported to a meeting of the Academy at Paris that he found that the secretion of this light to be subject to conditions, which the appearance of rays; his observations in this respect agreeing with those of M. Gernez, who had previously found that the phosphorescent property of plants of the spectroscope without discovering either obscure or brilliant rays. The same was true of the light emitted by the cucutos, between the eyes and the wings. It is probable, as observed by M. Milne Edwards, that the substance susceptible of becoming phosphorescent is not the blood. M. Blanchard, at the same meeting, insisted on the great interest of researches which might lead to an elucidation of the mysterious structure of the organs of insects which secrete the phosphorescent matter. In a note in the Memoirs of the Academy of Science for 1863, M. Blanchard described the phosphorescent insects of this genus, which had been brought alive to Paris in some old wood, crossed and sunk in the sea, and which had retained their discovery.

THE INFLUENCE OF OZONE ON VEGETATION has been studied by Mr. Carey Lea, of Philadelphia, and the results reported in the American Journal of Science. Two sets of experiments were made. In the first, the water with which the seeds came in contact was made to contain ozone, while in the second, the water was not. For the first, phosphate of iodine, silicate of potash, and nitrate of soda were added to the ozonised water, and for the other to water in a proportion such as to be equivalent to the ozonised water. In each of the experiments, at the end of a given term of comparison, two equal seeds were taken and placed in a perforated cover of the water, and were also placed under bell-glasses resting on glass plates. Wheat and barley grains placed under bell-glasses resting on glass plates. Wheat and barley grains were placed on the surface of moistened sand, and covered with glass, the ozone-generating mixture. Other plants not exposed to the ozone were used. The results of the experiments are as follows:—The effect of the ozonised water, and those exposed to the ozone, was remarkable, especially with the wheat plants. In the latter, the roots were found to be more widely spread out, and to reach to the bottom of the vessel. In these exposed to it the roots, moreover, were found to be more than twice as long as those of plants placed under bell-glasses, but not exposed to ozone. The stronger wheat plants after a length of six inches, and developed six rootlets, averaging only three centimetres each in length; while those not exposed to ozone had only many roots exceeding two inches and a half. As a whole, the roots produced by the plants exposed to ozone were found to be not crowded out of the vessel produced in its absence from an equal number of healthy seeds. One curious result of the above experiments is, that the wheat plants which were merely set in the water themselves in a vertical position; the greater part of them fell over on one side. The weight of the grains of the maize affected these plants a better support. The presence of ozone also prevented the usual formation of mould on seeds placed in contact with air and water under a bell-glass.

TWO-HEADED SERPENTS.—In the Proceedings of the Boston Society of Natural History (U.S.) is an account of two specimens of monstrosity in surprises given by Professor Wyman at a meeting of the society. One of these were a young black snake (Coluber constrictor), which had two complete heads united to a single trunk. The two heads were of the same size, and were connected by a neck of the same length. The same region the transverse bands usually found in the young of this species were divided longitudinally into two equal parts, which were placed one on each side of the body

CHESS.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

JUBA, and Others.—It is highly probable that the Indian composer of problem No. 1016 was quite aware that his position consisted of an easier solution than the one stipulated, but, as the author of the work in which it appeared had not mentioned it, he left the conditions—which, to make it a stated number of moves, rendered it more or less—as it must be admitted that theapproximations give far greater scope for the invention of beautiful and difficult problems than the rigid law, which makes every solution that of a double solution.

CHARLES BUTLER.—You are mistaken; look at the position again.

T. G. (Ware).—Your problem is received; but before giving your publication the aid solicited, we should like to have some more satisfactory evidence of the capabilities of your chess staff than the gain of prize positions published. Other than we have examined the composition is admirable, as a glance, by 1. B to K 6th (ch), 2. Q to Q Rsq, &c.

J. B. (Hastings).—Your solution of problem No. 1015 is correct in every respect. On receiving it we hastily, and under the impression that White must in three moves without the slightest strategy, secured mate. For instance, he may take the Black Queen with his Bishop, giving check, and Black must play his Queen to her fourth square, to be met with Queen first, and mate in three moves; or he may take the Bishop, as you suppose, with his Queen, and Black must play his Queen to her fourth square, to be met with Another Move, Pawn to Queen's fourth, and so arrive at the first move in the solution of a problem, is not permissible; the position you have been good enough to contribute has been published in the Chess Player's Chronicle.

FANFAN.—No chessplayer should be without the admirable "Handbuch des Schachspiels," by Bledow and Wilhelm, 1843. Of the works of Allgaier, Jaenisch, and Walker, the "Handbuch" by Bledow and Wilhelm is, we believe, the most complete. Each is a comprehensive treatise on chess openings when published; and moreover, looking at its enormous bulk, the cheapest. "Von aus Staunton" is through many editions.

A CONSTANT SUBSCRIBER.—The "Chessplayer's Handbook" contains, you will find, the information you require. Staunton's "Chess-Player's Companion" is a collection of games, and not a treatise on the game.

A VETERAN.—The notice in our last Number will explain the matter. You are quite right.

BREAKFAST BEVERAGE.—Homœopathic practitioners, and the medical profession generally, recommend COCOA as being the most healthful of all beverages. When the doctrine of homœopathy was first introduced into this country by Hahnemann, the universal prevalence of coco stiller attracted the notice of a specialist to the remedy; the nut was either sugarplized in the shell, or the kernel was roasted and ground with little sugar. Dr. Dudgeon, Homœopathic Consultant, was induced, in the year 1850, to turn his attention to this subject, and in a lengthy series of letters in the homœopathic periodicals, he made the first to produce an article pure in its composition, and as delicious in flavour as the finest chocolate, and which should be more thoroughly soluble in the human stomach.

EPPS'S HOMŒOPATHIC COCOA is distinguished as an invigorating and grateful Breakfast Beverage, which, when taken with a due regard to its nutritive qualities, will render unnecessary the employment of medicine. Dr. Dudgeon, and Dr. Drysdale, M.D., Physician to the Homœopathic Hospital, Golden-square, say:—"Coco contains a great variety of important nutritive principles absolutely necessary to the growth and sustenance of the body." Again, "As a nutritive, Coco is unrivalled." Dr. Drysdale says, "Epps's Homœopathic Cocoa-Nibs are prepared in a breakfast-cup, by pouring boiling water or milk. No. 1289.—VOL. XLV. SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 26, 1864. WITH A SUPPLEMENT, FIVEPENCE

THE AMERICAN PRESIDENCY.

IN itself, the election of a President of the Federal States of America could have aroused very little, if any, of that anxiety which agitates those who watch a competitive struggle. The issue was so certain that, even amongst the people for whom the event possessed a real and actual interest, the sweet pangs of suspense must have been wanting. Practically, Mr. Lincoln had no antagonist. An invitation to a four years' occupation of the White House at Washington now by no means implied a pleasant tenure of an office, which, in a self-governed country, used to be accompanied with few of the cares and not too many of the responsibilities of state. The candidature for the presidency was, therefore, peculiarly circumscribed on this occasion, and scarcely any individual emerged from comparative obscurity to present what has often proved the best claim to support—namely, an ignorance on the part of the nation over which he was to rule (to say nothing of the world in general) of anything about him. When the contest came to be confined to Mr. Lincoln and General M'Clellan, the principles on which it was to be conducted were supposed to be defined. The one was the acknowledged representative of the Republican and the War party; the other was announced to stand as typifying the Democrats, and something more, for, while he was proclaimed as the embodiment of a policy which desired the preservation of the Union, it also comprehended the restoration of peace between the contending States. However those who laid down this policy proposed to carry it out, at least General M'Clellan at a very early period of his candidature, which, by-the-by, seemed on a great measure to have been involuntary on his part, disclaimed all notion of being responsible for the opinions which had been inscribed for him on what the Americans call his ticket; declined to pledge himself at least to a peace-at-any-price policy, and so effectually neutralised any opposition to Mr. Lincoln, which was thereafter carried on but feebly in his name, and the race became as nearly as possible a walk over. On the face of it, then, it would appear that the principles which Mr. Lincoln professes and which in an especial manner he may be supposed to represent, have obtained a great triumph, and the policy of the Federal States may be assumed to be settled for the next four years. It may also be asserted that the re-election of the existing President is a more decided testimony in favour of the cause of which he is the emblem than the first choice of a man who was at that time, so to speak, a political abstraction. The force of these assumptions may nevertheless be subjected to some modifications.

Although American history is so shortlived that events scarcely survive in memory for four years, it is possible that it may be recollected, even in such a go-ahead country, that the election of the President, four years ago, was the result of a severe struggle for political ascendancy between two parties in the State, both of which put forth their strength to secure a victory. The entire people of the United States were engaged in this contest; every State in the Union took part in it; and, as they contended for a principle, and one which enlisted all the sympathies and all the energies of opponent parties, it mattered very little, at the moment, who or what the man was who represented the opinions of the section which was seeking to oust another from power. Perhaps the very fact of his obscurity was considered to be an element in the triumph of the Republican party if it succeeded; for their immediate purposes a Chinese joss would have sufficed. They did triumph, and ere long King Log was created by circumstances into one of the most powerful and responsible rulers in the world. Without entering into the question of his capabilities for his great function, we must accept the fact that Mr. Lincoln has in a manner become a necessity to the Federal party, and his re-election has become almost a matter of course. In a sense, which is not the usual flattering sense, he is without a rival. Not only is he practically freed from the impediment of personal opponents, but the suffrage by which he is re-elected has been changed from that to which he appealed in his first candidature. The whole of the Southern States have nothing to say in this election, and with them, of course, has vanished the great bulk of the personnel of the party which fought so hard against Mr. Lincoln in his representative character in 1860. Numerically, the Democrats have lost at least two thirds of their strength in the presidential election for the Northern States. The records of previous elections show how vast was the influence of the party in power in the choice of President. For years, what was theoretically a popular election had resolved itself into a system of succession. How much more complete must be that organised action of the ascendant power in the State in such a matter now, when the Government is a practical despotism, and when—to take one special, though new instance of its peculiar command of these resources which have always been unscrupulously used in political movements—the election could be turned by the votes of the soldiers in the army, of which the aspirant to re-election is not only technically but in a very efficacious sense the Commander-in-Chief! Indeed, it seems almost a waste of argument and a supererogation to bring together the circumstances which would prove that the re-election of Mr. Lincoln was a certainty. Divination with regard to the effect of his continuance in power is by no means so easy.

There are those who do not hesitate to lay down the results of this event in no measured language. With them it signifies the deliberate abdication by the American people of their rights of self-government; an unconscious and voluntary adoption of a military despotism, towards the subversion of a popular Government, which may still exist in form, but which in substance is gone; and that the second presidency of Mr. Lincoln may be taken as the period from which to date the complete abrogation of the American Constitution and the commencement of that transition state, so well known to students of history, through which republics pass on their way from democracy to tyranny. Again, it is pronounced that this re-election means, in the North, new conscriptions, abridged liberty, and less press freedom, and that the impressment and, throughout the South, a renewed outburst of all the horrors of war, followed by social anarchy. It is probable that soberthinking men, even amongst those who least affect Mr. Lincoln and his policy, will be inclined to treat such high talk as manifest exaggeration.

It may, perhaps, be permitted to some impartial observers of the great contest which is going on in America to derive some gleams of hope in reference to the settlement of the question in issue, even out of this apparently unhopeful circumstance of the renewal of a presidential term as pledged to a prosecution of the war. At least one point has been gained—the supremacy of a distinct and intelligible policy has been asserted. The Northern States understand that they will be asked to continue to carry on the war on the same scale and with the same undiminishing energy for four years more. Surely, this is a proposition which may well bring every man to reflection and to a careful consideration at once of the causes and the effects of the struggle in which the antagonistic States are engaged. Not when prepared to give in our adhesion to that doctrine of the abnegation of popular Government by the American people to which we have alluded above, we are prone to hold to a belief that, ere long, public opinion in the North will assert itself in reprobation of a policy involving consequences so tremendous, sacrifices so awful; and all for what is fast becoming a dream of national unity, a unity founded, not upon sympathies of race, habits, and institutions, but on mere geographical considerations. There is already a peace party, which is neither contemptible for number nor influence; and with such a programme as is openly offered to the Federal States by the twice-chosen symbol of civil war, it is incredible but that the feelings and principles of that party will make way into the minds of a people, in the main sober, sensible, and not so over-burdened with abstract enthusiasm as to be prepared to immolate all that it holds dear for an idea.

During the period of this civil war it is computed that the Federal States have contracted a debt amounting to three thousand millions of dollars; that within the same period hundreds of thousand men, in the prime of health and in the pride of early manhood, have died, and two hundred thousand more have been maimed and crippled, in the service of the North. Every family in those States has its wounded son; many have several; and hundreds of thousands more whose sons have fallen never to rise again. This is the retrospect: is it to be the prospect? No doubt the American people have shown great resolution, great aptitude to look their trials and troubles in the face; but the question is whether they have not done enough to prove those qualities, and whether the time has not arrived when they may yield to gentler influences, and think of submitting their political differences to other arbitrement than that of the sword. Again, we take on ourselves to repudiate the notion that the people of the North have now delivered themselves up as mere puppets into the coarse hands of Mr. Lincoln for another term of presidential power. It may be that at present he symbolises a sort of vague opinion of the majority of them; but to say that, if that opinion should change and their wishes take a different direction, he will be able to control and mould such a people to purposes of mere personal ambition, is to presuppose in this creature of unhappy circumstances the commanding qualities and character of a Cromwell—a resemblance which even caricaturists have not yet imagined. It is possible that, after all, the prolongation of Mr. Lincoln's tenure of office will be productive of ultimate benefit to the people over whom he has been selected to rule for eight years: and that, by means which he never intended and the consequence of events which he never contemplated, he may become the involuntary saviour of his country.

THE LINCOLN SCHOOL OF ART.

THE Engraving on our first page is a view of the interior of the large room in Silver-street, Lincoln, occupied by the first public exhibition of paintings and drawings which are the work of the students of the Lincoln School of Art. This institution, which owes its existence, we believe, mainly or entirely, to the efforts of the Rev. J. S. Gilmore, one of the Minor Canons of Lincoln Cathedral, was established in February, 1863, when a room in the Corn Exchange was granted for its accommodation, and Mr. E. R. Taylor, from the Department of Science and Art, South Kensington, was appointed the master. Lincoln is now a city which is so rapidly increasing, both in population and commercial importance, that it was felt that there was a good opening for the establishment of such an institution. But, as its promoters were quite unable to tell to what extent it was likely to obtain pecuniary support, they commenced operations on a very small scale, with great caution. It was soon found, however, that the number of students who presented themselves for admission was not only a fluctuating mechanics, was much greater than the room could admit; and a second room was therefore engaged, but this also was soon overfilled. Under these circumstances, it became necessary to obtain more ample space; and, after many attempts and failures in various quarters, an arrangement was concluded, by which the committee of the National School in Silver-street granted permission to the committee of the School of Art to build an additional room to the present school. This work has lately been executed, under the superintendence of the architect, Mr. Drury, by Mr. Huddleston, builder. The new room is sixty-two feet from the 10th of October last. It is 24 feet wide, 70 ft. long by 27 ft. wide, and 24 ft. high; and may be used on public occasions for a lecture-room. As shown in the engraving, the ordinary work, is subdivided by removable partitions into an elementary room, a model-room, a modelling and painting-room, and a store-room; besides which there are attached to the building a ladies' cloakroom, ladies' and gentlemen's lavatories, and other offices. The sum required for the above additional buildings, and for furniture and apparatus, is £600, of which £380 has been raised by voluntary contributions, £200 having been granted as a donation in aid by the Board of Science and Art, and there is still a deficiency of £70.

The school was inspected, in February last, by Mr. R. Hart, R.A., the Professor of Painting in the Royal Academy, who expressed high approval of its progress. An abstract of the results of the first annual examination and the award of prizes and certificates to the ninety-four students of the first grade passed a satisfactory examination in drawing, and that twenty-six gained prizes and certificates in the second grade. The pupils of the national schools in connection with the School of Art. The number of students of the second or higher grade who passed their examination in free-hand drawing, model drawing, geometry, perspective, and mechanical drawing was twenty-three, of whom twelve gained prizes; and the number who passed in the first grade passed successfully in two distinct subjects, while one hundred and seven passed in all the five subjects of examinations. Among the students of the first or highest grade, to the number of twenty-two medals were distributed for proficiency in the following departments:—Four, outline from copy; three, outline from life; five, shading from copy; one, outline of human figure; two, outline of foliage; two, painting from cast; one, painting from figure; two, modelling; one, machinery. The drawings of twelve students were honourably mentioned. The school has also obtained one national medallion for an original design, an honour conferred before by any local school in first year, but only four of these medals are allotted for competitors in the stage of elementary drawing, and the sixty-eight others are for the higher grades. The test is therefore extremely severe; and there are twenty-seven schools whose students have never yet won this distinction. The medallion—by J. P. Bellew—in the Lincoln school has been purchased by the Department at South Kensington for its collection of specimens. It is a fine example of the art, and we find no such good work as the result of one year's instruction. The distribution of prizes and certificates took place at a large meeting held in the Lincoln Corn Exchange on Tuesday, the 8th inst. The Bishop of Lincoln and the Bishop of Oxford, Mr. Beresford Moore, M.P.; the Dean of Lincoln, and the Rev. J. S. Gilmore, Hon. Canon, were the principal speakers—the Mayor of Lincoln presiding over the meeting.

In conclusion, this School of Art may now be fairly considered to have taken its place as one of the permanent institutions of the city of Lincoln; and we cannot but think that, in a place where there exist so many large establishments, in which a great amount of skilled labour is employed (one establishment alone employing more than 1000 men), it will be found to be of essential service to the working classes.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.

The Moniteur announces officially that the ordinary Budget of 1865 has been laid before the Conseil d'Etat. Receipts and expenditure are reductions to the extent of a million sterling, and of a surplus of a million of francs.

The Emperor has granted 1000f. to the fund for the erection of a monument on the ruins of the Château Bayard, in honour of the famous chevalier "sans peur et sans reproche."

A silver medal has been awarded by the Emperor to M. Singla, for the composition of a cantata which was performed at St. Cloud.

The Moniteur publishes an account of the distribution of the portion of ground at Sebastopol, conceded by the Russian Government for a cemetery to the French dead. The lots are given to the surviving soldiers who fell during the siege of the fortress are to be collected.

The French papers report further submissions of tribes in Algeria. General Yusuf is reported to have been highly fortunate as regards such submissions in the district intrusted to his charge.

SPAIN.

The Queen has taken a sensible and creditable step. She has bestowed upon the sufferers by the Valencia inundation the sum assigned to her privy purse for this year. The commissioners of Madrid states that her Majesty has contributed a million of reals (£10,000) from the privy purse. A royal decree has been issued by Government for the opening of a national subscription in aid of the sufferers. The respective Ministries are also ordered to submit to the Cortes such measures relative to the inundations as they may deem necessary to repair, as far as possible, the damage done by the said inundations.

The Cortes sessions are proceeding amid perfect tranquillity. The Government has a considerable majority in Madrid.

The Duke of Rivas, President of the Council of State, has resigned, and is succeeded by the Marquis Viluma.

Senor Mon has accepted the post of Ambassador to the French Court.

ITALY

The Chamber of Deputies has adopted the bill for the transfer of the capital to Florence by 317 votes against 70. The Senatorial Commission appointed to report on the bill for the transfer of the capital are favourable to the measure.

During the course of the debate an amendment was moved in favour of Naples as the capital. It was opposed, even by several Neapolitan members, and was finally withdrawn. In speaking against it, General La Marmora said he could affirm that the late King of Naples was now himself perfectly satisfied that he possessed no influence in the Neapolitan provinces. The general added that two days since, while were lying at Civita Vecchia, and were the property of Francis II. had been lately offered to him for sale.

Some members urged on the Minister the importance of increasing the defences of the country, but General La Marmora appeared, unlike most military men, to be disinclined to increase the expenditure for further armaments, and argued that Italy was now quite in a position to defend herself against any attack.

The whole financial scheme of the new Minister of Finance, Signor Sella, has been passed by a large majority in the Chamber of Deputies.

The Chamber of Deputies has adopted the bill for a reduction in the emolument of public functionaries.

The municipalities of Brescia, Capua, Leghorn, Ancona, and some others, have offered to pay in advance the land-tax for 1865, as suggested by Signor Sella. A debate has arisen in the Chamber of Deputies upon the question of a proportionate reduction in the emoluments of public functionaries.

General Della Rovere, the Minister of War in the late Cabinet, and also in the preceding one of Baron Ricasoli, died recently in Turin.

A Roman correspondent states that with the ensuing year a change will be made in the Papal currency by the adoption of the franc of the same value as that of France and Italy, with the denomination of the "lira papale."

BELGIUM.

Yesterday week the Chamber of Representatives discussed the Budget of Finances, and it was adopted by 41 votes to 34.

On Saturday the Lower House successively adopted the Budget of the Public Debt, and afterwards proceeded to a general discussion on the ways and means, during which a debate, in which several members took part, arose respecting the gaming-tables at Spa, the suppression of which was generally demanded. The debate led to a promise by the Government that an inquiry should be made respecting the engagements entered into by the communal administration as to its share in the gains arising from the tables.

The second division of the Belgian Mexican Imperial Guard, amounting to 400 men, has been taken its departure from Ostend, and, like the former, will embark at St. Nazaire, in France, for their destination at Vera Cruz.

AUSTRIA.

The family compact by which the Emperor Maximilian of Mexico renounces, on behalf of himself and his descendants, all claim (except under a most remote contingency) to the throne of Austria has been laid before the Reichsrath.

In the Lower House, on Thursday week, Herr von Plener, the Finance Minister, brought forward the Budget for 1865. The total revenue is estimated at 518,000,000 fl., and the total expenditure at 548,000,000 fl. Eighteen millions of the deficit will be covered by the indemnity to be paid by the duchies for the Austrian portion of the Danish war expenses; the remainder will be provided for by a loan.

In the debate on the address in the Upper House, on Saturday, Count Rechberg said—"Austria requires the Prussian alliance as much as Prussia that of Austria. Unfortunately, these views were formerly unreciprocated, and the consequence was the war of the year of 1859, which nearly resulted in the loss of her position as a great Power, and which was the work of Count Cavour and the Prussian middle States look to Austria for help, and every Government in Austria must maintain an alliance with them." Count Rechberg then pointed out the necessity of the great German Powers acting in concert with the Federal Diet. The address was voted by the House.

Despatches from Verona announce that troops have been sent thence to the Tyrol.

PRUSSIA.

The Princess Royal of England completed her twenty-fourth year on Monday. Her Royal Highness married, on Jan. 23, 1858, Frederick William Nicholas Charles, Crown Prince of Prussia.

Lord Napier, our new Minister at Berlin, had an audience of the King on Monday, and presented his credentials. Lord Napier afterwards visited the Foreign Minister.

Herr von Bismarck has addressed a circular note to all Prussian Consuls instructing them to report all vessels belonging to Prussia, which have passed into the possession of the great German Powers, as Prussian vessels. Such vessels are to pay the usual dues to Prussian shipping.

The semi-official journal of Berlin has an article intended to allay the apprehension of a disagreement between Prussia and Austria on the Schleswig-Holstein settlement. It is stated that Prussia is negotiating with Austria, in order to obtain her consent to the measures necessary to bring about a speedy withdrawal of the federal troops from Holstein.

The Polish trials are still dragging their slow length along at Berlin. The State Prosecutor has demanded that sentence of death and confiscation of property be passed upon the eight principal persons (one a member of the Chamber of Deputies) who are accused of high treason and lesse majesté. Sentence has also been demanded against one of the prisoners at the bar.

RUSSIA.

The Government has resolved on the abolition of convents throughout Poland. All those—and they form a large majority—that were implicated in the late insurrection are to be suppressed immediately, while the few remaining are to be placed under Government supervision, which, there is little doubt, will lead to their ultimate extinguishment.

GREECE.

The King has addressed a message to the National Assembly thanking that body for having finished the preparation of the Constitution, but suggesting a revision of one of its articles. This message gave rise to a debate in the Chamber, the Opposition proposing a vote of censure on the Ministry for having published the document before it came to the House. The House, however, declined, by a considerable majority, to pass the vote of censure.

AMERICA.

Mr. Lincoln has been re-elected President by a large majority. According to the Times correspondent, who telegraphed on the 16th inst., "Mr. Lincoln has at the lowest estimate a numerical majority of 400,000 votes"; and another correspondent telegraphs that "Lincoln has 212 votes to 254 electoral votes." Mr. Andrew Johnson, Military Governor of Tennessee, has been elected Vice-President. There were no serious disturbances during the election in any of the States.

On the night of the 8th inst. President Lincoln was serenaded by a company of Pennsylvanians, and on the night of the 9th he was serenaded by the Columbian Republican Clubs. Mr. Lincoln declared that the peaceable consummation of the recent elections in the midst of a great civil war must be taken by a Republican Government to maintain its existence in a great emergency, and at the same time preserve the liberties of the people. He said that the election was over, he appealed to all parties to unite in a common effort to save the country, and concluded by expressing his gratitude to Almighty God for directing the mind of the country to what he considered a right conclusion, he added that it afforded an satisfaction to think any other man might have been selected by the result.

It is reported that M'Clellan has tendered a resignation of his major-generalship in consequence of his defeat by Lincoln's people, if, and will probably offer him a command.

The Navy has made a splendid advance, in which he pledged the Government to a vigorous prosecution of the war and declared that there was no intention on their part to abandon the war measures against slavery.

Whilst the North continues to breathe threatenings and slaughter, the South appears to be busy at work. On the 7th inst. Congress of the Southern President at the reopening of the Confederate Congress, on the 8th inst., has been published. President Davis's message is of a pacific tone. He favourably reviewed the military, financial, and material situation. He complained of the non-recognition of the Confederacy by the Powers of the great Powers of Europe, but declared that the South desired no intervention, and was able to maintain its own rights, and that peace was possible without independence. He recommended that the slaves in the service of the Government should be raised to the number of 200,000, should be employed as engineers, labourers, and pioneers, receiving a preliminary training which would render them a valuable auxiliary in case of emergency, and should purchase their freedom at the end of the war. He disapproved any general levy and arming of the slaves; but declared that the alternative presented of subjugation or the employment of slaves as soldiers, no doubt exists what would then be his decision.

A bill has been introduced into the Confederate Congress enlisting all white men between eighteen and forty-five, and revoking all exemptions.

The war news is unimportant, and some of it more than usually obscure; that from Georgia, especially, is "confusion worse confounded." First there was a rumour that the Confederates under Sherman had been and evacuated Atlanta, and started off through Georgia towards Charleston. "This statement," adds the telegram, "requires confirmation." The statement is reiterated, however, by a despatch of the 11th inst., through Mr. Reuter's agency, but discredited by the Times' correspondent in a telegram of the same date. The latest item is dated the 12th, as follows:—"No particulars are yet known of Sherman's movements, but they are reported to be progressing favourably. The lowering of Atlanta has not yet been confirmed." So of General Hood. There were contradictory reports that he had succeeded in crossing the Tennessee with his troops, and that he had been foiled in the attempt. According to one account, he has destroyed the Federal gun-boats and transports at Johnsonville, capturing the officers and crews, and taking a large quantity of stores and artillery.

General Price was said to have been again defeated by the Federals at Newtonia, and to be retreating with his recruits and supplies towards Arkansas; and the Confederate invasion of Missouri was apparently regarded as terminated, for the Federal Generals Rosecrans and Pleasonton had returned to St. Louis.

There had been no serious operations in the neighbourhood of Richmond, though there had been some skirmishing, caused by a Confederate reconnaissance of General Grant's left. Generally the forces are said to be now as numerous as Grant's, and an offensive movement on the part of Lee was expected.

In the Shenandoah Valley General Ewell has superseded Early in the command of the Confederates; and Sheridan, with his Federal troops, has retired to Winchester. Rumours of an invasion of Maryland by Early, also of a co-operation movement by Longstreet and Breckenridge in South-western Virginia for an invasion of the Northern States. At last dates Sheridan was near Winchester, and the Confederates at Newmarket, receiving reinforcements.

In consequence of the destruction of the Confederate yam Florida, the Federal gun-boat had been enabled to reoccupy the town of Plymouth, in North Carolina.

The news of the seizure of the Florida at Bahia had been received, and had produced much discussion; but the New York Herald, a journal in the confidence of the Administration, declared that "America owed Brazil nothing and no apology in accordance with the usage of nations, for the seizure of the Florida."

The reprisal Shenandoah was continues her depredations.

Numerous citizens in Chicago have been arrested, charged with a plot to burn the city and release the Confederate prisoners. The Democrats have caused a protest declaring that the arrests were made on an excuse for military interference at the polls.

General Butler had taken the chief command of the troops in the State of New York; and it was asserted that he had warned gold brokers that they must not speculate in gold to the detriment of the Government. Boston has been proclaimed under Martial Law.

The price of gold had varied from 260 to 245, standing at the latter quotation.

New York advises state that Mr. Charles Windsor, for fourteen years one of the principal cashiers of the Merchants' Bank in that city, has absconded, leaving a deficiency in his accounts of about £50,000. The Mercantile Bank, after deducting this loss, has still a reserve of about £200,000.

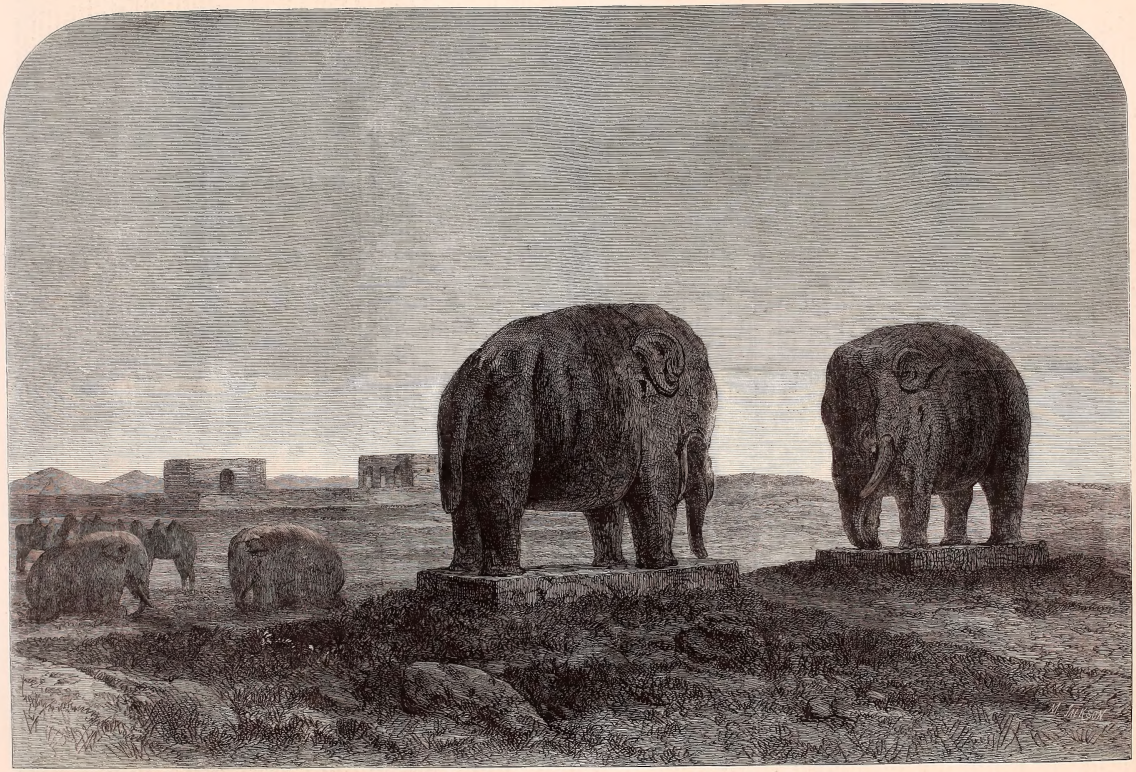
BRITISH NORTH AMERICA.

The Quebec Morning Chronicle publishes a draught of the constitution you propose for the federation of British North America. It is a long document, containing sixty-nine clauses. The Federal Government and Parliament are to be formed, as far as circumstances may permit, on the model of the British Government. The general Parliament is to consist of a Legislative Council and a House of Commons. The constitution is to be named by the Queen of the Crown, under the great seal of the general Government. The representation in the House of Commons will have for its basis the population, determined by the official census taken every ten years. The numbers at present to be, for Upper Canada, 82; Lower Canada, 65; Nova Scotia, 19; New Brunswick, 15; Newfoundland, 8; Prince Edward Island, 5. The duration of the Parliamentary Session is to be five years, unless previously dissolved by the Governor-General. There is never to be a greater lapse than one year between the end of one Federal session and another. The general Government is to assume all the debts and obligations of the different provinces. The general Government is to cause to be completed without delay the Intercolonial Railway between Rivière du Loup and Truro, in Nova Scotia, making it pass through New Brunswick. The Government is also to be charged towards opening communication with the Great West and the sea so soon as the status of the finances will permit.

A Quebec paper says:—"Prominent men from the Northern States are here urging the Canadian Government to encourage co-operation with the American authorities to preserve the peace of the frontier. Military measures on the part of the Canadian Government have been taken."

The examination of the witnesses in the St. Alban's raid was proceeding slowly in Montreal.

We learn from the Panama Star that the Vancouver Island Legislature has commenced its usual session. The Governor, Mr. Kennedy, in his opening address, informed the members that a despatch from the Governor of British Columbia was now on its road before them, that he had been called upon by her Majesty's Secretary of State for the Colonies to report upon a suggestion made by the Assembly of Vancouver Island that the two English colonies west of the Rocky Mountains should be united under one governor. Governor Kennedy accordingly forwarded an early expression of the views on the subject of the Vancouver Island Legislature.



THE CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.

MENIER'S CHOCOLATE.—The Chocolat-Menier may be obtained in twelve-penny packets, in tablets, and in boxes, of all grocers in the world. It is universally delightful, and its consumption has reached the extent of seven millions of pounds annually. Its success has been complete, because it is the only chocolate which is at once excellent in taste and most agreeable, even to the most exposed stomachs, those that no cocoa will be able to keep and digest. This combination of the two chief desiderata in an article of consumption—namely, good quality and a moderate price—has obtained for the Chocolat-Menier the unanimous position of Menier's house.

The following are the principles on which supplies of Cocoa and sugars established as the type whence it is produced other cocoa it there are selected has been kind of the principal:

1. The preparation of the Chocolat has in this establishment reached such a gigantic scale as that the cocoa-beans are roasted by steam, and ground by machinery, in the most perfect manner.

2. Having been established for many years it has had time to pay off the capital expenditure which is usually the first interest of a business, and having added to the fund given a great reduction upon the prices of houses not in a similar position can be made.

Premiums are the best reason these advantages are not enjoyed by the Chocolat-Menier Cocoa; if it lays at a cheaper rate good qualities of this article; and if, in fine, the factory operations are carried on with the most perfect machinery, the consumer should profit by it, and not be charged at a higher rate by other houses.

To this logical conclusion must be added that Menier's house has always followed the system of selling a good article at a fair price, and of excluding, in order to preserve this greatest possible number of consumers.

Finally, the Chocolat-Menier has not hesitated, by a diminution of its prices, to allow the consumer to profit by the reduction which has taken place in sugar and cocoa.

Wholesale, Menier, 23, Henrietta-street, Covent-garden; Retail, all respectable houses.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON: SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 26, 1864.

ELOQUENCE, adorned or "unadorned," is always welcome; but particularly so at this period of the year, when we have nothing to talk about seriously but the still less dreary ventilations in the Court of Divorce. A speech from Mr. Cobden must always command attention, and he has just delivered a long and an able one to five or six thousand people at Rochdale. It had been expected for some time; and that it had been carefully prepared we have no doubt. Nothing still less dreary pays his hearers the compliment of thinking over what he proposes to say to them, and because Mr. Cobden is fully aware that any address of his will receive the full benefit of examination by acute and unfriendly critics. It is clear that he was speaking with as much to his colleagues in the representation at Rochdale as to his fellows in Parliament and to his antagonists of the press. It is not for Rochdale mechanics that so practical a man as Mr. Cobden would ordinarily think it necessary to write the incomplete preliminary sketch or information of the young gentlemen at Oxford and Cambridge, or to launch epigrammatic and well-aimed taunts at a noble pensioner.

Yet, after a careful perusal of his speech, we are ungrateful enough to avow ourselves obliged to say, Cui bono? We are very glad to have the pleasure of reading anything that Mr. Cobden may choose to say; but we declare that we can find nothing in the address that seems to explain why he thought it necessary to speak at all. He has told us nothing that we did not know; he has told us nothing new in his views of any subject. The single exception, perhaps, may be found in his observations on the American crisis. Recent events in the New World have made it needful for the more enthusiastic admirers of Republican institutions to desist from their mere fervent utterances of homage, and to attempt defence of the apparent failure of those institutions, and also to deprecate hostile criticism of men who are said to have come to grief because they proposed to themselves such a great and glorious Ideal, so far transcending the grovelling ideas of the Old-World people. The defence is, we allow, bold and ingenious. We, who are basely content with a free press, freedom of speech, quiet and order, and a half-feudal, half-Republican Constitution, utterly offensive to fastidious theorists, but still tolerably easy to work well, are desired to hold our plebeian tongues, and not presume to pass sentence upon the disastrous fate of men who aimed at something more splendid than we ever had the grace and nobility to dream of. We are put-down as excellent Friar Tuck, in "Ivanhoe," puts down our Saxon ancestor who has begun a narrative much too frankly. "So, please your Reverence," said Gurth, "a drunken priest"—"But it does not please my Reverence," said the friar, "that there should be such an animal as a drunken priest, or, if there is, that a layman should presume to call him so." We are schooled, and must henceforth speak of the great American disaster in the spirit inculcated by the religious personage whom we have named. We will conclude the holy man rapt in a plain-thropic ecstacy, and we trust that our teachlidness will be appreciated by the American organs and orators.

Beyond this valuable lesson in manners, we own that we have not learned much from Mr. Cobden's speech at Rochdale. There was no need to teach us that the practised and adroit speaker could make any summed of public history exceedingly agreeable, or that he could flavour it with little pinches of seasoning, the taste whereof abides when the substantial matter has been digested. We appreciate Mr. Cobden's very well delivered hit at the Earl of Ellenborough, who denounced England for her love of money at the time when she is so "foolishly generous" as to pay her denouncer £7700 a year for nothing. Horace Walpole, with careful elaboration of sarcasm, could not have set down a sharper thing for his correspondents. The sketch of the Schleswig-Holstein agitation, the fear of the mercantile classes that the commercial ties that bind the sentimentalists should get us into a war, the "middle-class mob" that crowded the House of Commons and its avenues, eager to know whether Lord Palmerston meant to fight or not,—Mr. Cobden gave all this in his usual tone of agreeable narrative; but nobody knew all that better, and has almost had time to forget that Denmark has been invaded and dismembered. An account of the Crimean War would have been almost as profitable: and Mr. Cobden, indeed, may have considered it his duty to do one, for he enacted a sort of Earl Russell for having been active in promoting that vindication of the honour of England, and not of what Mr. Cobden calls the honour of the barnack-room. The sneer is not without meaning; but it falls pointless here, though it would be effective in the Germany of Heine. Mr. Cobden is speaking to a popular clique, but part and parcel of the living heart of the nation; and when the British Army, which is what is in Rochdale phraseology the barrack-room, feels its honour wounded, we may assure the apostles of peace that the people of England will share the feeling. Is there any reason for this to be made a question of public affairs? Surely a great politician needed not come forth to tell us that a great number of people felt a generous sympathy for the nation which had given a bride to the heir of England's throne, and which was being trodden down by German hordes in the pay of despots. Nor did we need to be told that the mass of the people, and their rulers, have sense enough to hold their passions in check, and not to yield to impulses which, however noble they may be, cannot always be indulged except at great cost. Had we gone into a war, we should have done an unwise but not an unjust thing; but we had wisdom enough to keep out of it. But we are scarcely in a mood to be complimented on a wisdom that was, to a certain extent, forced upon us. Had we been quite sure of certain friends, and of safe and certain communication, by sea or by means impossible that the Tower guns might have proclaimed a victory on the Elder. But all that is gone by.

On the one subject on which Mr. Cobden is always entitled to be heard—the subject of figures—he has but feebly echoed what Mr. Gladstone has been saying, in and out of office, for years. The cost of our armaments is fearful, and it is by no means spent to the best advantage. Our taxation is oppressive. But the House of Commons not only sanctions but urges the outlay. Mr. Cobden has told us this in many ways, and Mr. Cobden brings a superfluous testimony to the fact. Well, the Government now announces that it is resolved to make a very large reduction, and we are assured that such reduction shall be large enough to enable the Chancellor of the Exchequer to lighten the load. We rejoice to hear of this determination, and we are content to believe that a Government of honourable men really means to make the attempt it promises. We know not what more practical plan Mr. Cobden could propose. Assuredly, those whom he was immediately addressing are but remotely affected by the grievance complained of, which is borne by the middle classes; and these are reasonable enough to await its removal in a safe and constitutional manner. Mr. Cobden could hardly avoid a reference to an extension of the franchise; but he had not the hardihood to say that our national expenses are likely to be diminished by a deposit of power in the hands of the uneducated, whose sympathies, generous and honourable, would at brief notice involve us in a war at the bidding of Kossuth, Garibaldi, or any other representative of the oppressed. Therefore, beyond a very paraphrased narrative of what everybody knows, a few well-aimed hits and more or less merited sarcasms, and a recommendation of that which the Government has undertaken to do, we can find nothing in the Rochdale speech to enlighten us to the reasons that have caused a distinguished orator to break silence at such a time. We are compelled to repeat, Cui bono?

At the meeting of the Royal Geographical Society on Monday evening next—Sir R. Murchison, president, in the chair—the following papers will be read:—"Journey across the Rocky Mountains into British Columbia, by the Yellow Head Pass," Viscount Milton and Dr. Cheadle; "John Macdonall Stuart's last Journey of Exploration to Northern Australia, with an Account of the Country about to be Occupied on the Banks of the Adelaide River," John Macdonall Stuart.

A refreshment-room has been opened in connection with the reading-room of the British Museum.

THE COURT.

The Queen, with the junior members of the Royal family, continues at Windsor Castle, to the enjoyment of excellent health.

On Thursday week her Majesty drove in the castle grounds. Princess Helena, attended by Lady Caroline Barrington and Lord Methuen, went to London, returning to the castle in the afternoon. The Prince of Wales, attended by Major Teesdale, Colonel the Hon. A. Hardinge, and Lieutenant-Colonel Kingscote, spent the day hunting with the harriers. The meet was at the farm of Mr. Aldridge, at Chippenham, in Bucks, His Royal Highness, accompanied by the Hon. A. N. Hood, arrived at the meet at twelve o'clock. The Prince partook of luncheon at the house of Mr. Aldridge, and afterwards enjoyed several good runs in the vicinity of Chippenham, Slough, and Salthill. The Duke and Duchess d'Aumale arrived at the castle on a visit to her Majesty.

Yesterday week the Queen accompanied by Princess of Wales and the Duchess d'Aumale and attended by Lord Charles Fitzroy, drove out in a carriage and four. Princess Louise, attended by Miss Moeville, drove in the castle grounds. The Prince of Wales, accompanied by the Duke d'Aumale and attended by Major Teesdale, Lord Methuen, Colonel the Hon. A. Hardinge, and Lieutenant-Colonel Kingscote, passed the day shooting. The Duke de Nemours, Princess Marguerite, and Princess Blanche de Orleans arrived at the castle.

On Saturday last the Queen, accompanied by the Princess of Wales and Princess Helena and attended by Lord Charles Fitzroy, drove out. The Prince of Wales, attended by Major Teesdale and Lord Methuen, went shooting. The Duke de Nemours, Princess Marguerite, and Princess Blanche de Orleans, left the castle. The Right Hon. Sir George Grey arrived at the castle. The Royal dinner party included the Prince and Princess of Wales, Princess Helena, the Right Hon. Sir George Grey, Major-General the Hon. A. N. Hood and Lady Mary Hood, Dr. Jenner, Dr. Holman, and the ladies and gentlemen in waiting of her Majesty's and the Prince and Princess of Wales's respective households.

On Sunday the Queen, the Prince and Princess of Wales, Princess Helena, and Princess Beatrice attended Divine service in the private chapel of the castle. The Hon. and Very Rev. the Dean of Windsor officiated and administered the sacrament of the holy communion. The Right Hon. Sir George Grey had the honour of dining with her Majesty.

On Monday the Queen, accompanied by Prince Arthur and Princess Beatrice, walked and drove in the grounds of the castle. The Prince of Wales and Princess Helena, attended by the Countess of Macclesfield, Lady Caroline Barrington, and Lord Charles Fitzroy, were present at the consecration of All Saints' Church, Windsor, the first stone of which was laid, last year, by the Crown Princess of Prussia. The consecration was performed by the Bishop of Oxford. Princess Louise drove out. The Prince of Wales, attended by Major Teesdale and Lieutenant-Colonel Kingscote, went hunting. Earl Russell had an audience of the Queen and presented the Hon. P. C. Scarlett, upon his appointment as Envoy to the Court of Portugal. The Queen was the twenty-fourth anniversary of the birthday of the Crown Princess of Prussia. Prince Arthur, attended by Major Elphinstone, left the castle for Eton. The French Ambassador Extraordinary and Viscountess Palmerston, Viscount and Viscountess Sydney, the Hon. Sir Frederick Bruce, and Lieutenant-General Sir Richard Airey also arrived at the castle. The Royal dinner party included the Prince and Princess of Wales, Princess Helena, the French Ambassador, Viscount and Viscountess Palmerston, Viscount and Viscountess Sydney, the Hon. Sir Frederick Bruce, Lieutenant-General Sir Richard Airey, and the ladies and gentlemen in waiting of her Majesty's and the Prince and Princess of Wales's respective households.

On Tuesday the Queen, accompanied by the Princess of Wales, Princess Helena, and Princess Beatrice, and attended by Colonel the Hon. A. Hardinge, drove out in a carriage and four. Her Majesty visited the Norfolk and Windsor hounds and inspected the animals about to be exhibited at the cattle shows. Princess Louise, attended by the Hon. Mrs. Bruce, drove in the grounds in a pony carriage. The Prince of Wales, accompanied by the Hon. Sir Frederick Bruce, and attended by Major Teesdale, Lord Methuen, and Colonel Kingscote, passed the day shooting. The French Ambassador and Viscount and Viscountess Palmerston, Viscount and Viscountess Sydney, and Lieutenant-General Sir Richard Airey left the castle. The Hon. Sir F. Bruce had the honour of dining with her Majesty.

On Wednesday the Queen, accompanied by the Princess and Princess of Wales and Princess Beatrice, attended the Royal Tomb House for the purpose of inspecting various designs for the intramural decorations. Mr. G. Scott, the architect, was present during the Royal visit. Messrs. Clayton and Bell had the honour of submitting to her Majesty their cartoons for the decoration of the west end of the chapel. The Queen was also pleased to inspect the cartoons submitted by Baron Triqueti for the decoration of the walls beneath the north and south windows with pictures in marble illustrative of the life and work of Majesty, accompanied by Princess Helena, walked and drove in the castle grounds. Princess Louise, attended by Miss Moeville, drove out. The Prince and Princess of Wales and Prince Albert Victor left the castle.

The Earl of Caithness and Captain Sir W. Hoste have succeeded Lord Methuen and Lieutenant-Colonel Kingscote as Lord and Groom in Waiting to the Queen.

THE PRINCE AND PRINCESS OF WALES.

The Prince and Princess of Wales, with Prince Albert Victor, took leave of the Queen on Thursday week, and left Windsor for Marlborough House, en route for Sandringham. The suite in attendance upon Their Royal Highnesses consisted of the Countess of Macclesfield, Major Teesdale, and Dr. Holeman. The Prince and Princess left the Windsor station of the Great Western Railway at ten minutes past twelve. Their Royal Highnesses travelled in the state saloon attached to a special train, arriving at the Paddington terminus at ten minutes to one o'clock. The Prince and Princess were received at the station by Mr. F. Saunders, the secretary, and some of the directors of the Great Western Company. Their Royal Highnesses proceeded immediately to Marlborough House. Shortly before seven o'clock the Prince and Princess received Mr. Stratton (General Tom Thumb) and his wife, Mrs. Stratton, with their infant daughter, and Mrs. Stratton's sister, Miss Minnie Warren, at Marlborough House. The interview lasted about half an hour. Subsequently the Prince and Princess, accompanied by Prince Arthur and the Duke of Cambridge, honoured the Princess's Theatre with their presence.

On Thursday the Prince and Princess, accompanied by Prince Albert Victor, and attended by their suite, left Marlborough House at noon, en route for Sandringham House, where their Royal Highnesses will reside for about a month.

His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge returned to town on Saturday last from visiting the Earl and Countess of Strafford at Henham Hall, and Lord Hatherton at Hevercroft Hall, Staffordshire.

Their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess de Chartres have taken up their residence at their villa at Ham, Surrey, for winter.

His Excellency the Prussian Ambassador has left town for Windsor Castle, on a short visit to the Queen.

The Duke of Somerset returned to town yesterday week from Portsmouth.

The Duchess (Emily) of Beaufort has arrived in town from visiting Lord and Lady Zetpolin in Scotland, and Lord and Lady Scarborough in Yorkshire.

FASHIONABLE AND POLITICAL ENTERTAINMENTS.

His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge had a dinner party, on Monday, at Gloucester House, to meet General Todleben, the distinguished Russian engineer. The Duchess of Cambridge, the Russian Ambassador, and a select party were present.

Their Royal Highnesses the Count and Countess de Paris had a dinner party, on Saturday last, at their residence at Twickenham. Among the company were the Duke and Duchess de Chartres, the Duke de Nemours and Princess Marguerite de Orleans, Prince and Princess de Joinville, the Duke and Duchess d'Aumale, and the Spanish Minister and Mme. Comyn.

His Excellency the French Ambassador entertained a select circle at dinner, on Tuesday evening, at the Embassy in Albert-gate.

MARSHAL BAZAINE, THE FRENCH COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF IN MEXICO.

THE Portrait of the most recently appointed of the French Marshals is engraved from a drawing by our artist, M. Beaucé, who is now at the Marshal's head-quarters in Mexico, where the Marshal and his état-major (to which M. Beaucé has been attached in his capacity of Government painter) are awaiting their orders to return to France, in more peace of the pacification of that hitherto turbulent country and its definitive consignment to the rule of the Emperor Maximilian. It was for his conduct of the war in Mexico that the youngest French Marshal received his baton. But if ever there was a soldier par excellence, such a one is François Achille Bazaine.

Born at Versailles, in 1811, he pursued his studies with remarkable intelligence till the age of twenty, when he felt an irresistible vocation for the military career, and engaged himself as a volunteer in a regiment of the Line. He had no reason to regret this engagement, for in two years (1833) he was appointed Sub-Lieutenant, and in this capacity was sent to Africa, where he passed a couple of years in constant activity, and distinguished himself in a high degree by his talent and bravery. In 1835 he was present at the famous combat of La Macta, and was made Chevalier of the Legion of Honour for having, notwithstanding his severe wounds, ably sustained the retreat of his column. As soon as he recovered, he took service in Spain, where he fought ardently and with success in the cause of Queen Isabella, and was covered with distinctions of all kinds on his return to France, in 1838. It would be too long in this place to recapitulate all the details of the Marshal's brilliant career; it may be stated, however, that he rose rapidly in rank, and in 1840 returned to Algeria, where he assisted in the capture of Millianah. At this date the corps of the celebrated Chasseurs de Vincennes was organised; and as the most difficult tasks were thenceforth to be confided to the picked men forming the first battalion of this since famous branch of the French army, Bazaine was appointed to the command of a company, and carried off the officers' prize as the best shot in a rifle contest. The next twelve years were passed in constant fighting and gradual promotion in Africa, where he rose to the rank of Colonel in 1851. Three years later he embarked, as Brigadier-General, for the Crimean expedition, and co-operated in all the principal undertakings during the long and glorious siege of Sebastopol. He was frequently mentioned with distinction in the Commander-in-Chief's reports; and on the 8th of September, 1855, after having been seriously wounded in the assault of Sebastopol, was appointed General of Division and Governor of Sebastopol, a post he occupied till the return of the French troops to their native country. Several honourable military positions were subsequently confided to him. In 1859, he crossed the Alps as commander of the third division of the first corps d'armée. At Marignan he covered himself with glory, having resisted for an entire day the constant attacks of an enemy in great force. Here he was again wounded, and had the honour of being mentioned in the order of the day by the Emperor Napoleon; but, in spite of his sufferings, he was found in the thickest of the melée at the decisive Battle of Solferino, where he again attracted the approbation of his Sovereign.

Recent events in Mexico, which have resulted in this brave soldier receiving the highest mark of military honour, are too fresh in the memory to require recapitulation. As we have seen, throughout a service of upwards of thirty years Marshal Bazaine has never remained inactive, and his career counts almost as many campaigns as years of duty. Every promotion and every decoration conferred upon him was the recompense of some brilliant feat of arms. France herself has enjoyed little of his presence; but it was in distant countries and on foreign battle-fields that he attracted the attention of those who dispense the rewards of military service.

SCENE FROM "LE BOURGEOIS GENTILHOMME."

THE humorous pencil of the late Mr. Leslie was never more happily employed than in illustrating that congenial spirit, Molière. The objections cannot be urged against a "Gentilhuminated set of works certainly do not apply in the case. Leslie's illustrations of his favourite authors—such as Shakspeare, Moliére, Cervantes, Sterne, Le Sage, Addison, and Scott—not merely satisfy the strictest requirements of those authors' conceptions, but often have the virtue of new creations in another language. In the group we have engraved, though very slight in execution, and representing a scene of less subtle humour, and broader, more boisterous fun, than Leslie generally selected, the painter's appreciation of character, gesture, and facial expression are sufficiently apparent. Can our readers imagine a better representation of the rich and vocalen-fle—the silly "cit," whose head being turned by the fine gentleman who does him the honour of becoming of him large sums of money, is delighted (although old enough to have a marriageable daughter) to acquire the manners and accomplishments, the luxurious habits and foppries, and even the vices, of "people of quality." For we have suppressed that M. Jourdain, the Bourgeois Gentilhomme, engages, besides masters for fencing, dancing, music, philosophy, and a fencing-master, who demonstrates—at least, to his pupil's satisfaction—that by following his precepts regarding certain small manœuvres of the wrist a man without any courage is sure to kill his man and not be killed himself. To enjoy fully the scene before us, we must further suppose that Nicole, the cook-maid, has just entered, and, after a long involuntary fit of laughing at the strange aspect of her master in a new fashionable costume, requiring a variety of many colours, has been joined by her mistress, the sensible and unpretending Mdme. Jourdain. The two women rail in no set terms at the folly and conceit of Jourdain; but the enormity and absurdity of his ambition and studies are creditable and useful. He endeavours to silence his wife by explaining the formation of the vowel sounds and announcing the astonishing fact (both derived from the valuable lesson of the master de philosophie) that as the conversation then being held is not in verse, it must be nothing else but prose. "Is it not fine," he replies M. Jourdain; "but you thrust in tierce before you thrust in carte: and you do not wait for me to parry." Poor M. Jourdain! he is slow to appreciate what is a fine compliment to his progress in the untaught but nimble and determined person generally gets at least the first hit, and the prose less naturally adroit, though aided by a knowledge of the rules of the art.

MUSIC.

Our two opera-houses still afford little matter for remark. At Her Majesty's Theatre, Gounod's "Faust" has continued to be the pièce de résistance, varied at intervals by "La Traviata" and "La Dame de Lauwerroor," the latter performed in Italien. It has been understood that Mr. Harrison had engaged this lady for a limited time; but this seems not to be the case, nor, indeed, has he himself said so in his announcements. Mdme. Lagrua, who has performed with both these operas, without being a great star, has much merit, and has obtained a favourable reception. We regret that we are about to lose both Mr. Sims Reeves and Mr. Bodda. The former is engaged at Barcelona, and the engagement of the latter is nearly terminated.

At the Royal English Opera we are about to have an important novelty, "Le Diable à Quatre," Rose, or, "The Devil among the Tailors," which is to be performed for the first time this evening. The composer—a well-known talents and established position give reason to form high expectations of a work from his pen.

The Sacred Harmonic Society began the season last evening with a performance of Mendelssohn's "Elijah."

The New Philharmonic Society gave their seventh soirée musicale at St. James's Hall on Tuesday, the 19th inst., when an excellent selection of vocal and instrumental music was performed under the direction of Herr Wilhelm Ganz. The principal instrumental pieces were Beloyne's quartet in A minor, op. 44, played by Messrs. Watson, Willy, Hill, and Aylward; Dussek's grand duet in E flat for piano and harp, by Miss Fanny Baker and Mr. T. H. Wright; and Miss Alice Mary's duet in A, for piano, violin, and violoncello—the last beautiful work, performed by the composer, with Mr. Witt and Mr. Aylward. The vocal pieces were sung by Mdme. Rudersdorff and Mr. Bond, both of the English Opera, Covent Garden; and Mozart's "Ave Verum," and Mendelssohn's "O hills, O vales of pleasure," were sung by Mdme. Dolby. The violin fantasia by Ernst, performed by Herr Joachim, was encored, and the principal pieces were warmly applauded.

The Round, Catch, and Canon Club, a society established above a quarter of a century ago for the cultivation of this part-music, held their second meeting of this season, at Willis's Rooms, on Saturday last. The performers numbered about forty. Mr. Frances and Mr. Baxter; tenors, Mr. Edward Land, Mr. Handel Gear, and Mr. W. H. Cummings; basses, Mr. Winn, Mr. Bradbury, Mr. Lawler, and Mr. Alfred Mellon. Among the most remarkable performances on this occasion were, "When Sapphia tuned the quivering lyre" (Danby), sung by Mr. Baxter, Mr. Land, and Mr. Gear; "Hail, smiling morn" (Spofforth), glee, "Fill, my boy," the tenor solo sung by Mr. Cummings. This is a flourishing society. The list of members presents the names of many distinguished musicians and amateurs; and at its meetings the finest part-music of the old and modern masters are sung with a refinement, ease, and effect not to be excelled.

Mr. Kennedy, the favourite Scottish vocalist, having returned from a successful tour in Scotland, gave one of his entertainments, at Westbourne Hall, Westbourne-grove, on Monday evening last, to a large and enthusiastic audience. Mr. Land agreeably varied the entertainment by the performance of a new pianoforte piece, "Recollections of Burns," introducing several of the most beautiful Scottish melodies with which the poet's words are associated.

The Windsor Glee and Madrigal Union, composed of the members of the choir of St. George's Chapel, gave their first concert of the season last week in the Townhall, under the direction of Dr. Elvey. Professor Bennett's beautiful cantata, "The May Queen," was admirably performed, the solo-singers being Miss Susanna Cole, Mr. Hunt, and Mr. Briggs. It was followed by a miscellaneous selection, which included Mendelssohn's "Autumn Song;" Dr. Wesley's "O sing unto my roundelay;" finely sung by the Misses Cole; and the "Jewel Song" from Gounod's "Faust," sung by Miss Cole with effect.

Adelina Patti has achieved a fresh triumph by her appearance at the Théâtre Italien in the character of Adina in the "Elisir d'Amore." She looks and acts the little village coquette more charmingly, and warbles Donizetti's pretty music most exquisitely. The Parisians are in raptures.

Gounod's "Mireille" is about to be reproduced at the Théâtre Lyrique, reduced by the composer to three acts, and otherwise altered considerably. We hope, however, that these reductions and changes will be adopted, especially the curtailment, of which it stood greatly in need.

The Sunday Popular Concerts at Paris (in imitation of our Monday Popular Concerts) have begun for this season, at the Cirque Napoléon, under the direction of M. Pasdeloup. The first concert included Weber's overture, "The Ruler of the Spirits," Mozart's symphony in G minor, and movements from Mendelssohn's music to the "Lobgesang;" Beethoven's pianoforte concerto in B flat, played by Herr Ritter; and Lachner's suite in D, for the orchestra. A most musical programme, and one well calculated to improve the taste of the Parisian amateurs.

A curious lawsuit is now pending at Hamburg between the manager of the Opera and Herr Sontheim, the first tenor. Herr Sontheim had been called upon to sing in one of Wagner's operas, but had refused, on the ground that he could not be legally compelled to destroy his voice. Several eminent singers have given strong evidence in support of this plea, and the result is expected with much interest. The case is the more curious, as the only music that is injurious to the voice, Almost every modern opera may be objected to on the same ground. Perhaps four bars of the "Barbiere" or "Cenerentola" are the only music that, for the purpose of singing the part of Valentine, in "The Huguenots," during the first run of that opera. Look at the music of "Guillaume Tell," the "Prophète," and other operas, which, if sung as the composers intended, would be equally destructive: so that the question now raised at Hamburg is not a trifling one.

Berlioz's opera, "Beatrice et Benedict," has a run, at present, at the Grand-Duc Theatre at Weimar, Mdme. de Milde, as Beatrice, and Herr Pohl, as Benedict, are performing the parts in which they sang.

Master Willie Pape, the young pianist from Alabama, having made a successful tour in the West of England, is about to proceed to Ireland.

THE FRENCH.

A rumour, by Mr. John Oxenford, has been produced at Dr'ry Lane, under the title of "A Young Lad From the Country." The curtain in question is Mr. Damon Dobbs (Mr. G. Belmore), a Yorkshire horse-dealer, who has just succeeded to a considerable property, and is ill-treated by her brother, besides offending a gentleman with whose he has to transact some important business. Further misfortunes follow, which he gets into a terrible predicament, but final blunder sets all the rest right and brings the perplexed action to a satisfactory termination. The drama is full of broad and pungent fun, and the actors, who worked hard to secure its success, and thoroughly accomplished their purpose.

A change has come over the spirit of the management at the Lyceum, and it is announced that "The King's Butterfly" will shortly be removed in favour of "Roy Bliss," in which Mr. Fechter will reappear on Monday week.

A new piece has been produced at the New Royalty. It is in one compartment, by Mr. F. C. Burnand, and called "Cool Shop," which is partly founded on one of the tales of the Brothers Grimm, and is, we think, likely to become popular. There is a sabbath which follows which he performs in the Queen Mimic, and the final blunder sets all the rest right and brings the perplexed action to a satisfactory termination. The drama is full of broad and pungent fun, and the actors, who worked hard to secure its success, and thoroughly accomplished their purpose.

The Californian papers give an excellent report of Mr. and Mrs. C. Kean's reception in San Francisco, to which place they went direct from Melbourne. Mr. Kean made his first appearance in California, on Oct. 8, in "Henry VIII." and "The Jealous Wife." On the 10th they appeared in "Louis XI." and "Their appearance has accepted by the critics as the revival of taste in relation to the drama. We quote from one of the papers some remarks, the moral of which, at this time, we think it well to lay before the public of this country. The writer complains that the taste of the theatre-goers of San Francisco has become grossly corrupted by the performance of a company of some excellent dramatic talent, but no artiste with sufficient national reputation to ensure full houses or to arrest the downward tendency of the public taste. The performances which had become debauched by adventurers in the 'profession,' who, instead of using their talents to amuse, instruct, and improve, by a series of pieces, termed 'spectacular,' in which exposed limbs and indecent rant usurped the exertions of mind; and disastrous results have ensued in the demoralization of dramatic enterprise." Theatrical managers grateful is "depraved public taste by ministering to its desires; and, without pretension who were really accomplished at their profession, substituted pretenders who had no scruples on the score of propriety; and adapted their pieces to the perversion of such depraved tastes as Maerppa and Jack Sheppard with a brazen-faced assurance that caused the 'judicious to grieve.' We regret that this journal is published in a distant home; and we shall be glad if these remarks of our colonial critic should lend theatrical adventure and speculation to reflection on the mischief they are perpetrating by such improper exhibitions.

The National Standard, in Shoreditch, was on Saturday again opened for the performance of dramatic pieces, the proprietor of this colossal theatre is established. "The Lady of Lyons" was performed, Miss Edith Heraud supporting the part of Pauline with her usual delicacy and force, and Mr. Glenny showing great promise as Claude Melnotte. Mrs. Hodson, as Mdme. Deschappelles, was unexceptionable, and the piece was mounted in the costliest. It is to be hoped that the public encouragement, so signally manifested on the occasion, will continue, for it would be matter for serious regret if this magnificent edifice should be lost to the higher drama. At the East End it ranks the same as Old Drury at the West, and equally requires the aid of a great star to secure success. On Monday evening "Ingomar" was acted, the savage hero being performed by Mr. Glenny, and the part of Parthenia by Miss Heraud. The house was again crowded.

The legitimate, also, is in the ascendant at the City of London, where Mr. and Mrs. Stuart Bell have been performing in "Macbeth" and "Hamlet." These artistes were known a few years ago as the popular performers of the Marylebone Theatre. Strangers conductor of that establishment has other views, and provides for his patrons the horrors of "Mother Brownrigg," as newly dished up by Mr. Marchant. The heroine, Mary Clifford, was played by Miss Marion Farris, and in the last scene the audience were gifted to witness the "ascent to the realms of bliss." We cannot these mixtures "convey to sorrow than in anger."

The Milan Gazette states that Canova's colossal bronze statue of Napoleon I. was last week placed on its pedestal erected for it in the Brera Palace at the cost of the municipality.

Letters from Hobart Town mention the rumour of the discovery of a gold-field in Tasmania—said to be on the banks of the River Huon. If so, Huon may make a little money with his boat during the rush.

COLUMN FOR THE CURIOUS.

THE Society of Antiquaries held the first meeting of the season on the 17th inst., Earl Stanhope, the president, in the chair; when Mr. Tite, M.P., read a paper of considerable interest, descriptive of some recently-discovered remains of the Wall of Roman London. Mr. Tite stated that his discovery, in 1853, of the beautiful tesselated pavement, 19 ft. lower than the foundations of Gresham House, in Broadstreet, led him to believe that similar remains existed in the same neighborhood; strengthened by the fact that in Finsbury-square a portion of the ancient wall still existed above ground, which, beyond Roman, was unknown to be of Roman foundations. (Here were found, in 1852, the supposed volcite of a capital and some inverted cornices, besides a supposed Roman aerophagus, nearly entire, now in the British Museum.) In 1841, the Blackwall Railway, further north than this point, cut through Roman remains of the great wall, beyond which, however, things remained in the same state until the autumn of this year. In August last, during the large works for the London line of some watchmen in Cooper-row, Mr. Clifton, the architect, discovered some curious remains of such Mr. Tite found to be an extensive fragment of a Norman wall, with arches-slits and other defensive appliances. The fragments was 100 ft. long and in height, from the bottom of the foundation to the top of the parapet, 44 ft.; the foundations and much of the wall were under-built with Roman, built of square stones in regular courses, with bonding courses of Roman brick of intense hardness, and excellent cement; the latter being so hard that a wedge could not be procured for exhibition. Mr. Tite, however, obtained one broken in half, as hard as any real earthenware, and, as stated in Roman brick-work, the whole was called a tile, about a foot square and one inch and a half thick. The mortar between the bricks was nearly as thick as the bricks themselves, and was mixed with pounded brick. The exact line of these remains was shown in a plan of London in the reign of Hiadrith, when the wall and gates of London existed.

Mr. Tite then referred to a few other localities where undoubted Roman remains of the wall were traceable—viz., Camomile-street (found by Dr. Woodward, in 1707); the street still called London-wall (portions removed 1717-18, when Bethlem Hospital was taken down); and near Moorgate. Mr. Tite then gave a interesting resume of this portion of the history of Roman London, pointing out that there could have been no walls at the time when Suetonius abandoned it, in A.D. 61, when Boadicea was in the zenith of her power, as the Regnum Belcus, but Mr. Tite inclines to the second century of our era. He attributes the finishing of the wall, and the gates, to the great Archbishop Langton and William Marshall, Earl of Pembroke, having first received Queen Mary's permission to repair the ancient town walls. At these times the associated Barons assumed their arms, and, with their followers, went to Westminster, and received their Charter. They were, however, soon advised by messengers to return immediately to London. On this they returned to Water, and encamped at Aldgate, where they remained till the 15th of May, 1216, the sunday before Ascension Day. Finding the gates open, says Roger de Wendover, the Chronicler, and not any tyrannic, they broke down the bolts were at his service service; for the rich citizens were favourable to the Barons and the poor cast were with the Barons, and the King, who was then in a ruinous state, they were repaired, principally with the materials of the Jews' houses in the Old Jewry, which were taken down in order to the defences. Mr. Tite pursued his history of the wall of London through the reigns of Edward the Confessor, Henry III., Edward I., Richard Craper, Ralph Josselyne, in 1477, completely restored all the walls, gates, and towers, in the same manner as they left by the Goldsmiths' and other companies; and by Sir John Crosby, of the Grocer's Company. The gradual increase of the necessities of the city, and the Great Fire of London, in 1666, completed the destruction of these once important defences, so far as the knave left by the Goldsmiths' Company would waive.

Mr. Tite stated that the total area inclosed by the walls which still constitute "the city of London" is only about 300 acres.

Evidence of the increased value of land in the City was given a few days since upon a compensation claim upon the Metropolitan Railway. The property in question was that held under Queen Anne-street square, leased, in 1856, for twenty-one years, at £70 a year. The house was built in the reign of Queen Anne, and was let on lease for one hundred years longer. In 1708 the square was a fashionable locality, and numbered four or five peers as residents. The principal question was the amount of the claimant's interest. The railway, in part with the property, which has increased, and is still increasing, in value. The jury gave £2,000 for the house, and £2400 to £2500, with 15 per cent for the compulsory sale, and the jury awarded the compensation of £2,850.

The dust and bones of the learned John Selden have, during the recent repair and restoration of the Temple Church, been "carted away and shot into a dustheap." This desecration, which scarcely equals the dust of Alexander stopping a bunghole, has been dealt in a lengthy letter to the Gentleman's Magazine, by "A Templar and Redivivus," to the Times. Opposite the bell-turret, in the burialground, the correspondent found a decayed blue flag or slate lidgestone, inscribed with the following words, which, as no one stone "laid over the earthly remains of one who has ever been considered not only their greatest, but their most learned lawyer, worthy of the past, either in his own or any other age." This find led to inquiries and evidence, which have not since ceased to be forthcoming, that dust and bones of the profound scholar have been ignominiously treated as above; which is very remarkable, seeing that, according to the account of Aubrey, in 1659, the body of Selden was buried where it was said to have been spared to render their depository secure. Aubrey tells us—

His coffin was a stone one, with a slope or holce, sufficient to go a-end way with bricks, of which also the bottome was paved, but the side at the bottome for about a foot was plaine and smooth, and upon that stood his coffin covered with black bayes) both, and upon that wall of marble was pannelly (above a foot) and in the middle a piece of great thickness, with this inscription —" Hic jacet corpus Johannis Selden, qui obiit 30 die Novembris, 1654." Over this was a great stone laid, as flat as the pavement, even with their ground, and upon that was thrown the earth, &c.

As it is impossible to suppose that dust, "Old Mortality Redivivus" suggests that the spot of the interment should be marked by a granite slab, inlaid with brass, inscribed with the simple epitaph which Selden himself wrote; and that the dust removed should be removed from its present dismal abode behind the seats of the Benchers of that Middle Temple to the Temple Church, a British antiquity, and that it may be read without inconvenience this simple memorial."

Wimbledon Manor House, the property, as Lord of the Manor, generously proposes to convert into a public park, is a site of great interest in early British history. On the high ground, at the southwest side of the common, on account circular intrenchment, called by the country people the Rounds, and, in Camden's time, Bensbury, from Cuthlaf's-burg, or Cuthlaf's town. Cuthlaf, Prince of Kent, slain in the battle fought at Wibandune (or Wimbledon), between that Sovereign and Ceaulin, King of the West Saxons. It comprises about seven acres, and on one side appears to have been defended by outworks; the surrounding ditch, from eight to ten and fifteen deep, is still in many places perfect. Lately by scrubby oak, management has been attributed to the Britons, the Romans, the Saxons, and the Danes; it was, probably, a British stronghold, subsequently occupied by soldiers of the other nations in succession; weapons and urns, the latter Roman, have been found here. Douglas, in his "Nenia Britannica," speaks of the Rounds as a fortification, which he conceived to be seen on Wimbledon-common, to the left of the road from London to Kingston; all of these, with the exception of the last-mentioned, have swept away to mend the road. In the laying out of the Common for the projected park, it is hoped that the archæological interest of the site will be more respected.

St. Eustache, one of the finest and oldest churches in Paris, is now being repaired with great activity. The church occupies the site of a chapel dedicated to St. Agnes, built in the twelfth century and removed in 1532, when the present church was commenced, but it stood being laid with great pomp, on the 19th of August, by Jean de la Barre, Provost of the merchants of Paris. The works were not finished until one hundred years afterwards; the choir, which is very fine, dates from the reign of Louis XIII. It was in this church, on the 3rd of April, 1791, that the body of Mirabeau was deposited, carrying with him to the grave, as he said, "the last shreds of the monarchy." Cerutti pronounced his panegyric, and the same afternoon the remains of the great orator were conveyed to the Pantheon, whence they were expelled two years afterwards. The works were re-

The Salisbury Town Council are about to erect a new Grammar School, at a cost of £5000.

It is proposed to connect Birkenhead and Liverpool by a railway under the Mersey.

Mr. Jenkins has been elected for the tenth time Mayor of Cardigan.

During the week ending Nov. 10, 107 births (those of 49 boys and 58 girls), and 128 deaths (those of 61 males and 67 females), were registered within the municipal boundaries of Dublin.

The Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, accompanied by Lady Wodehouse, visited the Dublin Exhibition on Thursday week, when an address was presented to him by the Royal Dublin Society.

The knighthood of the Legion of Honour has been conferred on M. Paulin Nyboyet, the French Consul at Sunderland, as a reward for the services he has rendered to the shipping trade of the two countries.

Alderman Gardner, of Liverpool, has been presented with a service of plate, which cost nearly £500, on resigning the mayoralty of that town. An attempt to increase the allowance to the Mayor, who now gets £2000, was defeated last week.

Sir Robert Peel made a speech at the meeting of the Royal Dublin Society, on Monday evening, on the drainage of the land in Ireland. He thought the great necessity for the country was for better drainage, and consequently the improvement of the soil could be effected by private capital. He therefore suggested that efforts should be made to induce the Imperial Government to advance money on loan for this purpose. He promised any such movement his strong support.

The members and friends of the Halifax Mechanics' Institute held a soiree, followed by a public meeting, yesterday week, to celebrate the extrication of the institute from debt. The building and fittings have cost £10,000, two thirds of which has been cleared off by voluntary subscriptions and donations. Lord Frederick Cavendish presided at the meeting, which was addressed by his lordship, Mr. Childers (the Mayor of Halifax), Mr. Edward J. Holdsworth), Sir F. Crossley, M.P., Mr. E. Akroyd, Archdeacon Musgrave, and Mr. J. Stansfeld, M.P.

One night last week two women took train from Ladybank to Cupar, but by some mistake they were put into a carriage which was joined to jump out, and did so. A young man tried in vain to dissuade them, and even got hold of them both by the waist to keep them, but in regard to him was lulled.—Eight men were killed in a coal-pit at Dudley on Wednesday week by the snapping of the chain as they were ascending; forty-five were nearly 200 ft.—A drill-shed for volunteers fell down at Liverpool last week whilst in the occupation of a section, when two men were killed and several hurt.

There was a great meeting at Rochdale on Wednesday evening to welcome and hear Mr. Cobden. The extensive machine-works of Messrs. Robinson were closely crowded. A resolution of confidence with Mr. Bright on the forewement he has recently sustained (the death of a son) was unanimously passed. Mr. Cobden then addressed the meeting, and commented upon several of the leading questions of the day, reviewing the events of the Session and expressing the confidence he felt in the Liberal party with regard to both the Ministers and the Opposition. A warm vote of confidence in him was passed at the conclusion of his speech.

The certificates and prizes awarded for the middle-class examinations were distributed on Wednesday evening in the corn Chamber at Oxford, under the presidency of Mr. Walter, M.P. Amongst those present were the Master of University College, the Master of Balliol, some of the professors, as well as the Mayor and other members of the Corporation. Mr. Walter opened the proceedings with an encouraging address to the private students, in which he commented with pride on the results of the system, and congratulated those who had taken part in it.

The Great Western, which has on board a large number of supposed recruits for the Federal army, is still detained in the Mersey. A considerable number of the "recruits" have left the vessel, and it is alleged, on the other hand, that attempts have been made by bodies of lukewarm men to get on board, with the view of working their passage to New York. Instructions have been forwarded, on behalf of the Government in London to Superintendent Denham, of the Liverpool Police, to investigate into the circumstances of the alleged enlistments for the Federal service.

The new Presbyterian church, Rutland-square, Dublin, was opened yesterday week by the Rev. Dr. Cooke, of Belfast, in presence of a crowded and influential congregation, including Sir Robert Peel, Mr. Vance, M.P., and other persons of distinction. Mr. Allan Pollok, publisher, a wealthy merchant, gave £10,000 for the building, and it cost £3000 more. But the congregation are to endeavour to pay off the debt by the sale of pew accommodation. Even at the opening services the collections are given to the Hospital for Incurables and the Reformatory for Female Orphans.—Mr. J. J. Tobin, we are told, is now the most beautiful place of worship in the city except St. Patrick's Cathedral, now in process of restoration.

The annual meeting of the Worcestershire Union of Educational Institutes was held on Wednesday, at Droitwich. The proceedings consisted of a morning meeting for discussion, a public meeting, and a banquet under the presidency of Lord Lyttelton—a soiree, and evening meeting. The morning meeting was held at six o'clock, and was attended numerously, members being present. The chair was occupied by Sir John Pakington, Bart., C.B., M.P., and addresses were given on the platform by Lord Lyttelton, Lord Robert Cecil, M.P., the Hon. and Rev. W. Douglas, the Rev. Canon Melville, Rev. Dr. Cole, Rev. W. Moore, Mr. H. C. Lea, Mr. J. J. Powell, and the Mayor of Droitwich (Dr. Roden), Mr. J. S. Isaac, and others.

On Thursday week a meeting was held of the clerks employed in the service of the Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway, and their relatives, who were entertained by the directors and friends of that company at a soiree and ball, at the Belle Vue Gardens. The occasion of the entertainment was the opening of new schools which have recently been established by the directors of the company. They have been erected at a cost of about £10,000, and accommodate about 1000 scholars, are attached to a literary institute at Gorton, and, like that institute, are intended for the use of the company's servants. The chair was taken by Mr. E. W. Watkin, M.P., the chairman of the company.

The recent Yorkshire statute fair, for the hiring of farm and domestic servants, was held at Malton last Saturday, and others have, during the week, been held at Beverley, Bridlington, Driffield, Hornsea, Howden, Pocklington, Selby, Wetherby, and Thirsk. At most of these places the numbers attending were less than thought to be on the average, and the hirings were not put down these winter statutes have not been successful. The efforts of the clergy are continued for the removal of the nuisance from the occasions of the open market, and this commendable movement is very successful and promises to become quite general. The girls get their wages at the usual rates of hiring and they are provided with comfortable quarters without costs. Bibles are sold among them at very trifling charges. Wages, as a rule, for all classes of servants have decidedly increased, for farm men especially. Good order has so far prevailed.

The Speaker's warrant for the election of a member of Parliament for the Western Division of Suffolk, in room of Frederick William John Hervey (commonly called Lord Hervey), called to the House of Lords, has been issued.—Mr. Mills and Mr. Cavendish Bentinck, the Conservative members for Sussex, have issued an address of advantages given to their constituents on Thursday week, and the addresses they made were warmly received by the large meeting. Mr. Mills, in the course of his speech, said Lyndhurst, has announced his intention of offering himself as a candidate for Malton in the event of a dissolution, in order to give Malton the benefit of his influence in the Conservative interest.—The Hon. Grantham Yorke has retired from the representation of Reading, declining the Liberal Association of Yorkshire; it was agreed to bring forward Mr. James Martin, of the Inner Temple and Co., of Lombard-street, and Sir Crusack Roney, who is a large shareholder in the working collieries. The Conservative candidates are Mr. Lewis T. Wyndham and W. E. Bruckwell.—Mr. A. Fawke is the probable Conservative candidate for Penrhyn.—Mr. Cumming Bruce, who was the Conservative candidate for Inverness-shire, has declared himself a candidate for Launceston on Conservative principles, and in opposition to the present Conservative member, Mr. Hallewell-Rogers, who appears every promise of another of those fierce contests at the ensuing general election in which Woodstock has been so long famous.

The gale last week was one of much severity. At Liverpool, Holyhead, Falmouth, and Milford, considerable damage was done; and considerable vessels from other ports were driven into those ports for shelter, but the crew had time to get to their boats, and were picked up. During the gales of last week the boats of the National Institution assisted in many of the cases of the following wreck:—Five men from the brig Heroine, of Milford, left the Liverpool Customhouse in the steamer Cambrian, and Sarah, of Waterford, by the Tramore life-boat; several fishing-cobles and crews, called to the assistance of brigantine Ida; three men from the crew of Carmarthen, by the Tenby life-boat; and the Penarth life-boat assisted to save the crew of the brig of Newportshire, of Carmarthen. The Cambrian, Sarah, and Heroine were in the midst of the most distressing scenes. Deeply laden with coals, they were driven about in the storm in a distressed condition. The ship Chimera, of Liverpool, from Africa, with palm oil, was wrecked on the Horse Bank, off the coast of Lancashire. As soon as information was received the life-boats of the society stationed at Southport and Lytham put off, and were cruising about the bank many hours during the fearful night, but could find no trace of the wreck. On the following morning the life-boats again went out, and discovered the ship, but no trace of the crew, except one poor black man, saved by a Manchester-bound steamer. He gave, in broken English, a fearful account of the sufferings the poor fellows had endured while clinging to the rigging of the forecastmast, which unfortunately went overboard, and the whole of the men on it were drowned. A lamentable shipwreck also took place on the Mull of Cantyre; but before the Campbeltown life-boat could reach the scene the vessel foundered, and the whole of the crew were drowned. We regret to add that a large number of similar disasters occurred during the late fearful gale. In many instances the ships and crews disappeared before the life-boat crews were even informed of the casualties.—The Bridlington life-boat, on its way to its station, was exhibited on Tuesday at Manchester. The life-b-at was mounted on its transporting-carriage, and was driven through the principal streets by a fine team of horses, gaily decorated, and preceded by a band of music. The life-boat is named "The Edward Wilkinson," and is the gift of a lady at Bridlington, near Hull, to replace a very old boat at that place. The cost of the new boat and of three others had been collected by Robert Whitworth, Esq., of Manchester, amongst his fellow-citizens and friends. The first of the four boats, named after Mr. Whitworth, was launched at Cowes, and another Victor," after the infant Prince; the second, placed on the shores of Carm urthen Bay, is named "The City of Manchester;" and the third, reserved at Cardigan, is called "The Sun Branch," after a generous supporter of Mr. Whitworth's benevolent exertions.

A violent hurricane burst over Rio de Janeiro city and bay on the evening of the 10th ult. Rain fell in torrents, accompanied by large hailstones. Several vessels were driven from their anchorage, numerous boats were wrecked, and several persons perished. Captain Abeille, of the French brig Saint Marguerite, reported on board his vessel Admiral Elliot and his wife, who were in a sinking boat.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

CONSIDERABLE firmness was displayed in the Stock and National Securities, and rather an important rise has taken place in the quotations. The public have purchased largely during the week, and the Stock Exchange operations have been on a scale of average scale. The improved prospects of the commercial world have, no doubt, tended to the present favourable state of affairs.

Consols have been steadily dealt in, and the transactions with regard to both for accommodation having been incre sed, money in the general discount market has ruled easy in price.

The return of the Bank of England is very favourable. The stock at bullion is both considerably above the amount held at the corresponding date in 1863, and the reserve is likely to be a considerable one. The Bank directors have, in consequence, lowered their minimum rate for accommodation from eight to seven per cent.

On Thursday the directors of the Bank of France reduced their rate of discount to six per cent.

The Stock Exchange operations have been on a very extensive scale, activity in the demand. In the foreign exchanges the fluctuations this week have been unimportant.

On Friday, the 4th inst., Consols for Money were 89¼ ¾, and for the Account 89¾ ¼. Bank of England Stock, 218 ½; Reduced and New Three per Cents, 89¼ ¾; Three per Cents, 89¼ ¾; Exchequer Bills, 5s. dis. to par; Indian Securities have been steadily dealt in, and the quotations have ruled firm. Bank of Bengal shares improved. Joint-stock Bank shares have been dull in to a moderate extent, and prices have had a downward tendency. Miscellaneous Securities have been steady. Government Securities. The Miscellaneous Market has been rather quiet. We have no special feature to notice in the Railway Share List.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE (Nov. 21).—A very moderate supply of English wheat was on sale here to-day, on but middling condition. Fine samples sold at full prices; but the demand for all kinds of grain was extremely inactive, at a decline of 1s per qr. Foreign wheat was in fair request, at the currency of last week. Barley and malt were dull, at 1s per qr. cheaper on former terms. Floating cargoes of grain were a slow inquiry. Fine barley was firm in price. Oats were quiet, and unchanged in value. Beans and peas were cheaper, both in the value of malt. Oats were quite as dear as last week, with only a moderate supply on sale. Linseed was dull, at 1s per qr. cheaper. Cakes were in moderate request, at late rates.

Nov. 22.—Very few buyers were in attendance to-day, and sales, generally, progressed slowly, at a decline of 1s per qr.

English.—Wheat, Essex and Kent, red, 38s. to 39s.; ditto, white, 39s. to 40s.; Norfolk and Suffolk, red, 38s. to 39s.; ditto, white, 39s. to 40s.; Yorkshire red, 38s. to 39s.; ditto, white, 39s. to 40s.; Lincolnshire and Northumberland, red, 38s. to 39s.; ditto, white, 39s. to 40s.; grinding barley, 30s. to 32s.; Kingston and Ware, 36s. to 42s.; chevalier, 42s. to 43s.; Yorkshire grey, 30s. to 32s.; malting ditto, 34s. to 36s.; distilling ditto, 34s. to 36s.; malt, pale, 70s. to 74s.; ditto, brown, 68s. to 72s.; tick beans, 34s. to 35s.; grey peas, 32s. to 34s.; maple, 34s. to 36s.; white, 34s. to 36s.; boilers, 36s. to 38s.; Essex and Kent oats, 22s. to 24s.; Yorkshire ditto, 22s. to 24s.; Scotch feed, 22s. to 24s.; potato ditto, 22s. to 24s.; Irish ditto, 20s. to 22s.; rye, 32s. to 34s.; flour, 30s. to 32s. per sack; American, 30s. to 36s. per barrel.

Foreign.—Wheat, free, 40s. to 42s.; Baltic, 38s. to 40s.; other sorts very little a doing. Colonial command extreme quotations.

Nov. 23.—Wheat, 38s. to 42s.; barley, 30s. to 36s.; Calcutta, 32s. to 36s.; brimpseed, 42s. to 45s. per qr.; rapeseed, £30 to £32 per last; linseed, £30 to £31 per last; cakes, £6 10s. to £7 per ton; oats, 22s. to 24s.; beans, 34s. to 36s.; peas, 32s. to 34s.; flour, 30s. to 32s. per sack.

Nov. 24.—Mondoy.—Mondoy has, £2 15s. to £3 10s.; clover, £5 to £6 10s.; and straw, £1 10s. to £2 per load.

Hops.—The demand is steady, at full prices.—viz., from 110s. to 125s. per cwt.

Nov. 25.—Wheat, 11,000 qrs.; barley, 3000 qrs.; oats, 1000 qrs.; flour, 2000 sacks were, on sale here, on Monday morning. The best Scots and crosses were worth 3s. 4d. per 8lb. Sheep—The show of which was by no means extensive, sold at 4d. per 8lb. to 5d. 4d. per 8lb. The best Downs and half-bloods sold at 5s. 8d. per 8lb. We have to report a dull sale for calves, at 4s. 8d. per 8lb. to 5s. 4d. per 8lb. The supply of pigs was fair. Prices ruled steady, at 4s. per 8lb. to 4s. 4d. per 8lb. There were very few lambs engaged.

Nov. 26.—Wheat, 11,000 qrs.; barley, 3000 qrs.; oats, 1000 qrs.; flour, 2000 sacks were, on sale here, on Monday morning. The best Scots and crosses were worth 3s. 4d. per 8lb. Sheep—The show of which was by no means extensive, sold at 4d. per 8lb. to 5d. 4d. per 8lb. The best Downs and half-bloods sold at 5s. 8d. per 8lb. We have to report a dull sale for calves, at 4s. 8d. per 8lb. to 5s. 4d. per 8lb. The supply of pigs was fair. Prices ruled steady, at 4s. per 8lb. to 4s. 4d. per 8lb. There were very few lambs engaged.

For 8lb. to sink the offal—Coarse and inferior beasts, 3s. 4d. to 3s. 6d.; second quality ditto, 3s. 8d. to 4s.; prime large oxen, 4s. 2d. to 4s. 4d.; prime Scots, 4s. 4d. to 4s. 6d.; coarse and inferior sheep, 3s. 8d. to 4s. 4d.; second quality ditto, 4s. 6d. to 4s. 10d.; prime large ditto, 5s. 2d. to 5s. 4d.; small ditto, 5s. 4d. to 5s. 6d.; large coarse calves, 4s. 6d. to 4s. 8d.; prime small ditto, 5s. 2d. to 5s. 4d.; large rough fat pigs, 4s. to 4s. 2d.; small ditto, 4s. 2d. to 4s. 4d.; sucking calves, 12s. to 22s.; and quarter-old store pigs, 18s. to 22s. each. VIEWS IN DUTCH GUIANA.

GOVERNMENT-HOUSE-SQUARE, PARAMARIBO, SURINAM.

Guiana, of which Surinam is a part, was, together with the neighbouring islands, inhabited by various Indian tribes, amongst whom the Caribbeans were distinguished for their fierceness and valour. Towards the middle of the seventeenth century, after Sir Walter Raleigh and others had made a fruitless search for gold in the interior, a number of European colonists settled on the coasts of Guiana, in order to cultivate such produce as could then be fetched only by the long voyage to the East Indies. Encouraged by the fertility of the soil, in a few years French, English, and Dutch settlements were formed in this region. The natives, however, were not disposed to labour for the strangers, or to have any intercourse with them. They withdrew to the interior, leaving the settlers a wide field, but no hands to till it. In this difficulty the colonists of Guiana imported negro slavery for their help. Opposite Guiana lies the peninsula of Africa. The numerous chieftains of the negro race lived at continual feud and war with each other. They made great multitudes of prisoners, whom they were readily induced to sell to increase the labouring population of Guiana. This traffic in negro bondsmen proved such a profitable speculation that the slave trade, carried on by companies with large capitals under Royal charters, became a gigantic enterprise, favoured by almost every European Government, until the present century, which has witnessed its entire abolition.

Surinam was first taken possession of by the English, who formed a settlement in its present capital, Paramaribo, which city they built. In 1664, the Dutch attempted to form a settlement in the same neighbourhood, but were compelled by the English to retire. In February, 1667, however, during the inglorious war of Charles II. with Holland, the Dutch drove out the English. Paramaribo was, indeed, in October of the same year, again recaptured by the English; yet it was ceded to the Dutch, a few months later, on concluding the Treaty of Breda. In 1804, Surinam again fell into the hands of the English, but they took possession of it merely to prevent its being occupied by the French, who were then masters of Holland; and by the provisions of the Treaty of Vienna it was again transferred to the Dutch in 1816.

The soil of Surinam is extremely rich. Its forests abound with wild animals and birds of magnificent plumage. The country is traversed by broad navigable rivers. Of the 2800 geographical square miles, included in the Dutch territory, only 700 have been explored, and only thirty laid out as plantations. According to a recent census, the free population amounted to about 13,000, and the slave population to about 40,000. But in the interior of the country there are still numerous Indian tribes, who, rude and savage, obtain their whole subsistence from Nature's abundant stores—neither sowing, nor reaping, nor gathering into barns. There are, too, a host of "wood-negroes," or runaway slaves, who have often formed themselves into companies, excited their captive brethren to revolt, and become so formidable by their numbers as to have extorted treaties of friendship and commerce from the settlers and from the Government. The resources of this colony are literally unlimited, but require labour and capital to develop them. The climate, though tropical, is not exhausting for Europeans; locomotion by land and water is easy and inexpensive. We may hope that the liberty which the Dutch Parliament has bestowed upon the population of Surinam will not degenerate into license, and that they will show that their free labour is more profitable than slave labour has ever been. The thriving little city of Paramaribo, the capital of this colony, is pleasantly situated on the river Surinam, which is a scene of much bustle and traffic.

The accompanying Illustrations are from the portfolio of the "Scenery of the Netherlands' West Indies"—an interesting collection of twenty lithographic plates, recently published by Buffa and Sons, of Amsterdam.

DR. DE JONGH'S Light-Brown Cod-Liver Oil, and only Liver, Universally recognised to be incomparably superior to every other.

DISEASES OF THE LUNGS AND CHEST.
The extraordinary efficacy of DR. DE JONGH'S LIGHT-BROWN COD-LIVER OIL in Pulmonary Consumption may now be considered as fully established. Its marvellous power in the Cure of Consumptive Coughs, Asthma, Bronchitis, Influenza, Hoarseness, Sore Throat, and all Affections of the Chest, is unparalleled. It checks the complaint, assists the cough and expectoration, or promotes a more speedy and healthy resolution of the disease. Sir JAMES CLARK, Bart., Physician to the Household, Physician to the Queen, writes: "I have frequently prescribed DR. DE JONGH'S Light-Brown Cod-Liver Oil, and have found it to possess the peculiar virtues which DR. DE JONGH'S Oil without difficulty or distaste and with as much efficacy as when taken by the adult. I have also frequently observed that where I have seen it has caused an improvement as soon as any other I have seen it has caused an improvement as soon as any other remedy. I have no hesitation in stating that it appears to be quite unobjectionable." DR. DE JONGH'S Oil is undoubtedly the most valuable remedy we possess for chronic and constitutional disease."

SELECT MEDICAL OPINIONS.
The late Dr. PEREIRA, Physician to the London Hospital, writes: "DR. DE JONGH'S Oil is the purest I have met with."
"It was fitting that the author of the best analysis and investigations into the properties of Cod-Liver Oil should be the first to propose of this important medicine. Whether considered with reference to its purity, freedom from nauseous taste, or its unadulterated that, for medicinal purposes, no finer Oil can be procured."

ARTHUR H. HASSALL, M.D., F.R.S.
Physician to the Hospital for Consumption and Diseases of the Chest, Brompton.

"We think it a great advantage that there is a genuine Cod Oil to be had, and we have found DR. DE JONGH'S Light-Brown Oil such in every instance. Its therapeutic value is unquestionable, when prescribed, we recommend this kind, since, small doses are usually sufficient, and it is more easily taken and more permanent.—Clarence (from "Consumption, its Early and Remediable History").

DR. LANKESTER, F.R.S.,
Coroner for Central Middlesex, &c.
"I consider that the purity and genuineness of this Oil not only essential to its therapeutic action, but to the question of so good a character that DR. DE JONGH'S Oil is the purest sample I have met with. I have also written the best Medical Treatise on the Oil with which I am acquainted, and I find that DR. DE JONGH'S Oil possesses all the properties to be preferable to any other kind as regards genuineness and medicinal efficacy."

DR. LIEBIG,
Medical Officer of Health, and Chief Analyst to the city of London, &c.
"The Oil corresponds in all its characters with that named Pharmacopœia, and bears the test and the variety in the remaining reagents of DR. DE JONGH. It is, I believe, universally acknowledged to be the best Oil that is imported into this country, therapeutic power; and from my investigations, I have no doubt of its being a pure and genuine Cod-Liver Oil."

DR. BARLOW,
Senior Physician to the Hospital, &c.
"I have frequently recommended persons requiring the use to make use of DR. DE JONGH'S Oil, and I have always been well satisfied with its effects, and I believe it to be one of the purest that can be had from those cases in which the use of that substance is indicated."

EDWIN CANTON, ESQ., F.R.S.L.,
Analytical and Consulting Chemist, Birmingham.
"ARCHIBOLD'S Oil possesses the pale hue and the bland taste of genuineness which characterise DR. DE JONGH'S Light-Brown Cod-Liver Oil, and that is to be considered as the purest sample of Cod-Liver Oil I have ever met with, which I have also employed with a view to test their relative therapeutic value."

DR. DE JONGH'S Light-Brown Cod-Liver Oil is sold only in capsuled IMPERIAL half-pints, 2s. 6d.; pints, 4s. 9d.; quarts, 9s.; and in Cases of One Dozen Full Quarts, 108s. Sole Consignees, ANSAR, HARFORD, and CO., 77, STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

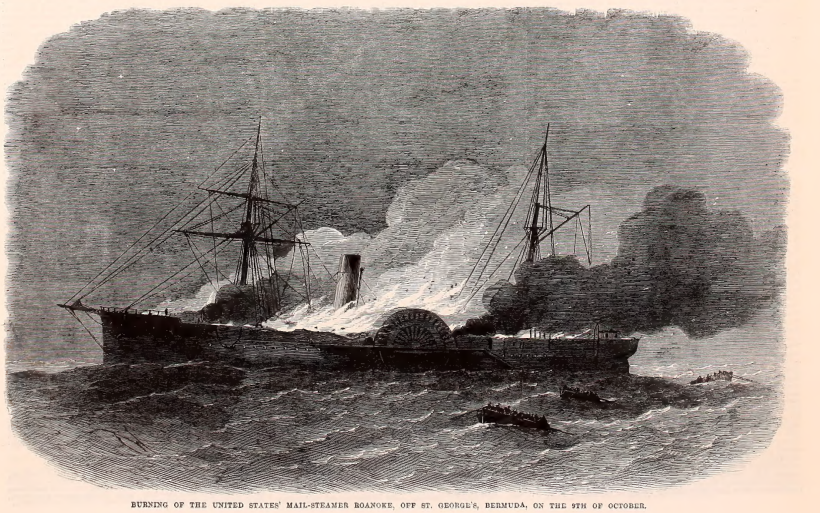
THE LATE MR. J. R. M'CULLOCH.



MR. M'CULLOCH, the well-known author of many books of high authority upon topics of political economy and national finance, died on the 11th inst., at the Stationery Office, of which establishment he had been Comptroller for many years. The deceased gentleman was in his seventy-sixth year. He was the son of a small landed proprietor in Wigtonshire, and was born at the Isle of Whithorn. He came to Edinburgh early in life, and was for some time occupied as a clerk in a writer's or lawyer's office. A more congenial field of labour opened for him when the Scotsman newspaper was started, in the year 1816, Mr. M'Culloch sent a contribution to the fourth number; and Mr. Maclaren, at once recognising the value of such a writer, enlisted him as a colleague. Mr. Maclaren, in the course of a year, resigned the editorship entirely into the hands of Mr. M'Culloch, who retained it about two years. During this period, not only by his connection with the Scotsman, but by his contributions to the Edinburgh Review and his delivery of public lectures on political economy, Mr. M'Culloch became well known as a writer and a student of that science. In 1820, when Mr. Maclaren, resigning his office in the Custom House, resumed the editorship of the Scotsman, Mr. M'Culloch left Edinburgh for London, where he continued, with increasing success, his labours as author and lecturer. In 1828 he was chosen Professor of Political Economy in University College, London, a situation he subsequently resigned; and in 1838 received the appointment of Comptroller of her Majesty's Stationery Office, which he has since held. His "Commercial Dictionary" is, of all his works, the most generally known and appreciated. This, as well as his "Geographical Dictionary," is a monument of vast industry and research. The intervals in which he was not occupied in revising the several editions of these bulky compilations were fully occupied by other literary tasks, such as his "Principles of Political Economy," his "Treatise on Taxation," his solid and well-considered contributions to the "Encyclopædia Britannica" and Edinburgh Review. He also conducted carefully and conscientiously the duties of his highly responsible office as Comptroller of Stationery; introducing, we believe, reforms in the management of that department which have effected an annual saving of many thousands of pounds. Mr. M'Culloch was on terms of confidential intercourse with the late Sir Robert Peel, Sir George Cornewall Lewis, and other statesmen; and Sir Robert Peel, as a mark of his sense of his high services in political science, conferred on him a literary pension of £200 a year. Mr. M'Culloch married early in life, and his widow survives, with sons and daughters, grandsons and granddaughters. One of his sons has been for many years in the Indian service, in which he holds rank as Colonel. Our Portrait is engraved from a photograph by Messrs. J. and C. Watkins, of Parliament-street.

THE LATE MR. J. R. M'CULLOCH.

DESTRUCTION OF THE STEAM-PACKET ROANOKE.

THE magistrates in session at the Townhall of St. George's, Bermuda, on the 10th ult., investigated a singular charge of piracy against Lieutenant John C. Braine, Acting Master in the Navy of the Confederate States, and a party of men in the same service, who were prosecuted by the Attorney-General of Bermuda for unlawfully seizing and destroying the United States mail-steamer Roanoke upon the high seas. The charge fell to the ground, of course, on the production of Lieutenant Braine's commission and his letter of instructions from Mr. S. R. Mallory, the Secretary of the Navy of the Confederate Government. The prisoners were therefore immediately discharged; but as the capture of this vessel, whether an act of legitimate warfare or not, was effected by most unusual means, it is worthy of a brief narrative and illustration. It seems that the Roanoke was accustomed to ply regularly between Cuba and New York; and at four o'clock on the afternoon of Sept. 29 she left the port of Havannah, passing the Moro Castle, at five p.m., with twenty four cabin passengers and sixteen in the steerage, the officers and crew numbering fifty, making in all ninety persons on board. The steamer proceeded on her voyage at a speed of twelve knots per hour, running within sight of the coast for two or three hours, the time passing agreeably and without anything unusual having occurred until 9.20 p.m., when about twenty-five miles off the coast of Cuba. The captain and crew were then surprised by a party of ten men among the passengers, under the command of Lieutenant Braine, who went through the ship dressed in a naval uniform, exclaiming, "In the name of the Confederate States of America, I demand the surrender of this vessel as a lawful prize," and calling upon Captain Drew, the commander of the Roanoke, to surrender as a prisoner of war. The announcement was immediately followed by the discharge of several pistols, with which the attacking party were armed. From that moment the work of capture commenced. Lieutenant Braine, taking the upper deck of the vessel, accompanied by his second officer, the purser, and a seaman, secured the the captain and officers on the deck, placing them in irons, while the first officer, first and second engineers, and the seamen proceeded with the capture of the officers and crew on the main deck, until Lieut. Braine and his second officer, leaving the upper deck in charge of the purser and a seaman, went below to the assistance of the first officer. In the space of fifty-five minutes the capture had been consummated, and the vessel was proceeding on her voyage as the Confederate

BURNING OF THE UNITED STATES' MAIL-STEAMER ROANOKE, OFF ST. GEORGE'S, BERMUDA, ON THE 9TH OF OCTOBER.

States prize steam-ship Roanoke. There was but little violent resistance made except by the carpenter of the vessel, who, after having surrendered, seized an axe and aimed a blow at the head of the first officer; but, the axe falling short of its mark, four balls pierced the body of the man, from the effects of which he fell and died in a few minutes. In a short time after the capture Captain Dyer was released upon his parole. The crew were kept on duty, as a few hours during the night, but the passengers were treated with the utmost civility and freedom. When the vessel arrived off Bermuda, it was Lieutenant Braine's purpose to bring Captain Dyer, the part of Sea Gorgas, lay in a stock of provisions and coals, then parole and land the passengers, proceeding on her way to the west to Wilmington; but, it having been found impossible to take the vessel into the British port, the only thing he could do was to burn the Roanoke, and, with his officers and crew, go ashore as fugitives. This he accordingly did; the crew and passengers, officers, and crew to a big five miles off from the steamship, the morning of Sunday, the 9th of October inst. Our Engraving is made from a sketch taken by one of the passengers, who has sent it to us, with a letter, through Mr. G. T. Fullam, late engineer of the Alabama. The Roanoke, it seems, was bound from New York by the New York and Virginia Navigation Company, who owned her as a blockade-runner between Bermuda and the length 218ft.; breadth, 32ft.; depth, 10ft. 6in., and measuring 1071 tons.

FINE ARTS.

MR. MACLISE AND THE FINE ARTS COMMISSIONERS.

SINCE our last report, about twelve months ago, Mr. Maclise has made a sequence of progress with his picture of the "Death of Nelson," in the Royal Gallery of the Westminster Palace. Not only has nothing been we consider the space covered, the number of the figures, the multiplicity of the details, and the elaboration of every part. The whole of the picture is nearly finished, while the wounded and those immediately surrounding him. The remaining space bears a proportion probably of less than a twentieth part of the whole of the vast design, and this is rapidly approaching its finish green, together with the general revision and retouching, may be completed by March next. Quite enough has been done to induce us to express a decided opinion that this will surpass even its renowned companion piece, the Waterloo picture—on the opposite side of the gallery. It is more luminous; for the artist had here to deal with daylight, and not an artificial effect. It is more architectonic in composition, the masts, spars, &c., having been introduced by Maclise in this result; while the number of shirtless "able-bodied" seamen introduced has afforded Mr. Maclise an opportunity for a display of his very extraordinary power of drawing "the figure" in the most difficult positions and foreshortening. From the greater complexity of the details, the work will possibly have occupied the artist somewhat longer than its two-fellow; nevertheless we have conceived so much as is already finally completed within some three or four years (including the preparation of the finished study in oil) is a result which, in the highest degree, surpassed in the history of art, and is only to be explained by the fact that Mr. Maclise has devoted himself (at, no doubt, a considerable pecuniary sacrifice) to these national works with an ungrudging, uncomplaining perseverance; never once asking for increased remuneration; labouring the year round, without intermission or holiday, day after day, early and late (working, in winter, by the aid of gas, far into the evening); and, in short, displaying that constancy and absorption which it is no wrong to the living or dead to say has been unequalled by any artist since Michael Angelo.

Such having the simple, well-known truth, a great deal of surprise has been felt in the art-world that, in fact, Mr. Maclise was not exempted from certain implied censures in the Report of the Commissioners appointed to consider the agreements between the artists employed and the Government, and the remuneration to be allowed. It may have appeared somewhat enigmatical, but it was not. Not without a semblance of inconsistency, Mr. Maclise, while declining to be rewarded and disclaiming to be praised in any way, yet drew attention to a little pamphlet, bearing the signature of a "Looker-On Member," in which the artist's case, as against the Commissioners is represented (with, it must be admitted, some interesting passages and a bad taste) in the light of a personal grievance, and his merits are warmly eulogised. However, it would, we believe, be a mistake to suppose that the unfavourable inference from this solitary instance of self-assertion on the part of Mr. Maclise (for it was very little) will, as he says, with characteristic modesty and generosity, that the writer of "these few remarks" sides too partially with himself. The little brochure referred to, we have supplied him with various kinds of information, and, in particular, the Commissioners' Report, which, as Mr. Maclise says, "is not to be had at Westminster much to their honour." And even if Mr. Maclise feels that he has a cause of complaint with a merely has the "leading journal" taken no direct notice whatever of the immense and otherwise incomparable artistic achievement in a leading article on a fine, but, also, for certain qualities, a matchless work by another painter at Westminster, a passage, a denunciation of the other wall-paintings at Westminster was made—a condemnation which might well have been intended to apply to the pictures in the corridors and House of Lords—but, in the Royal Gallery, one of the eminently artistic frescoes by the late Mr. Dyce in the Queen's Robing-room—the best work, we think, of the portrait assertions have been made which would be unjust to the merits of the entire, comparatively speaking, failure of the experiment of water-glass method of painting adopted by him, of having first introduced the art to attach to their remuneration that the very work which his late rest to decline, that the Commissioners, as no solicitation of the artist, raised the payments for the frescoes to £1500 each. And yet, in the next paragraph, the commission actually given to Mr. Maclise, with the assention of the late Prince Consort, to paint, besides absolutely without, and the pregnant cancelled. Now, had the should pronounce that such an engagement was impossible which voluntarily acknowledged in the inadequacy of the payments would have been easy to find a precedent for a similar increase being given, and for which we have already had a conspicuous example in design (though not, like Mr. Herbert, actually made the proceeding which, in a private person, would be called, if legal, be scarcely creditable. In the concluding paragraph of the Report the Commissioners express their "strong conviction that there should be no subsequent departure from the provisions of any contract which has been deliberately agreed upon. It is for the artist before he enters upon such an engagement well to consider how far the terms upon accompanies a successful work in a national monument or building affords an adequate compensation for any pecuniary loss which he may apprehend with regard to his private practice. We believe that the framers of this country from attempting to promote the cultivation of the highest branch of fine Art, by giving important commissions, than the adoption of a loose and indefinite system of payment." Now, although there is the suspicion of a niggardly, bargain-driving spirit in this paragraph, which keeps out of view the national and educational value of monumental paintings; and although it might be urged that it is the duty of Government to see that these great artists, like other public servants, should not work for the nation at any "pecuniary loss," it is not to be denied that the remarks are not altogether unreasonable in themselves, though they are invoked by any of the Westminster painters. But most assuredly they are wholly inapplicable to Mr. Maclise's case; and that this most punctual and honourable man and gifted artist should not have been empowered from the beginning to make application is likely to be deemed a public reproach. The hardship is, we understand, to be removed, but the leaven, we believe, remains, which, like some others which have been severely criticised, seems to have been introduced by members of the Royal Academy—a gentleman who may be presumed to be President of the Commissioners, and who, we confess, we cannot but regret that, unfortunately, however, the Presidential chair seems to have been unexpectedly and grieving more than an apathetic acquiescence in that estimate of artists' rights and claims peculiar to our insular people and government.

Since writing our recent observations on the "Winter Exhibition" at the Gallery of Painters in Water Colours, we have learnt that—contrary to what we had heard, and to ourselves—the pictures composing the collection are not exclusively the property of Mr. Fitzpatrick, the proprietor; but that, at the close of the winter exhibition in Pall-mall, a number of the works have been contributed by artists of their own property, subject to a commission on sale. This fact has been authenticated by several letters which we have received from the artist-contributors themselves. In so far, therefore, this becomes a bond fide exhibition in the sense that is usually attached to the word "exhibition."

CURRENT LITERATURE.

A History of the Sepoy War in India. By John William Kaye. (3 vols. Vol. 1, W. H. Allen and Co.) Mr. Kaye's new and weighty volume is in size and appearance extremely significant of the work it contains. Like Mr. Kaye's "Administration of the East India Company," it affords full measure of solid information, and is free from the vice of "padding." It is not a reasonable, straightforward, comprehensible statement of the causes which led to the Sepoy Revolt, and probably many, if not all, other thinking persons' opinion, led to that terrible and bloody struggle for Indian Mastery. The memory of deeds which made the ears of every one who heard of them to tingle, when "the Indian's doom, has not surely yet faded from the British mind. Its tragedies in all only too vivid of tidings which struck dismay to every heart, and carried sorrow into the home of almost every household. Of all who are not too young to remember the startling events of the years 1857 and 1858, there are few who can now look back upon them without relation, a friend, or an acquaintance, of those who does not still lament a an unequal loss, or who does not, at least, feel profoundly touched by many, if not all, other thrilling

THE PRESIDENTIAL CONTEST IN AMERICA.

NEW YORK, Nov. 3.

THE struggle for the presidency increases in interest as well as in bitterness. The passions of both parties have been excited, and accusations of fraud and falsification of balloting papers, committed, attempted, and planned, have been as thick as Iron sleet of arrowy shower.

On the side of the Republican, or Lincoln, party, nothing is heard but a daily din of "Treason! treason!" while on that of the Democratic, or M'Clellan, party, as vehement a cry is continually raised of "Tyranny!" and "Usurpation!" The partizans of Mr. Lincoln have the advantage of possession, and unwisely threaten to employ the military power at their disposal to keep the peace on the day of election, to prevent the reception of illegal and fictitious votes, and to arrest all "traitors" and other "disloyal" or "suspected" persons who shall present themselves at the polls. The opposing party, scandalised at the accusation either of "treason" or "disloyalty" directed against them by a faction that misuses the accident of its being the faction of the "ins" and not of the "outs," declares, in the plainest English, its determination to resist by force of arms any attempt on the part of the Federal Government or its military officials to coerce the people, or interfere with the free exercise of the constitutional right. They assert that the presence of soldiers at the polls, except as citizens, to cast in their votes like the rest, is an outrage upon public liberty which cannot be tolerated, unless the Americans are prepared to accept a military despotism and to allow Mr. Lincoln to perpetuate his power by the bayonet. It must be remembered, however, that the Americans of both parties in the North are used to the habit of "speaking daggers" at each other instead of using them; and that, perhaps, all this loud talking is but the bark of a dog that will not bite—mere "buncombe," intended for present effect.

The great issues of contention are—in the first place, the vote of the army; in the second, the vote of the Border States held by military occupancy, and in which so-called "disloyal" people, who will not take a test oath, are to be excluded from the polls. The second difficulty is by far the greater of the two, and threatens, if Mr. Lincoln manage it in the mode proposed by his faithful lieutenant, Mr. Andrew Johnson, in Tennessee, the gravest complications both now and hereafter.

As regards the soldiers, there appears every reason to believe that they are as three to one in favour of General M'Clellan. Although the original army of the Potomac, as it existed under his leadership during the great but indecisive series of battles which ended at Antietam no longer exists; though it has been decimated and re-decimated by fire and sword; though malaria and the camp-fever have struck down hundreds of sands and thousands of January; many of the survivors of its earliest combats limp about the streets of Northern cities, the maimed and mutilated veterans of a war in which they can no longer take a part; and though the term of service of many regiments in the field has expired, and scarcely a tenth of M'Clellan's original soldiers remain in the field, yet the whole army retains the traditions of his command, and the great majority have transported with them to the different theatres of Mr. Lincoln, will cast their votes for their former General. The same feeling, as far as is known, prevails in the other armies of the Republic. The men desire to place a soldier in the presidential chair—one, perhaps, like themselves, free from political reasons, and possibly because they share with the country at large the impression that Mr. Lincoln has been, is, and must continue to be, a failure, from constant defect of character and want of ability, and that any change made must be a change for the better.

But, as this result is past hoping for, the vote of the soldiers, however it may happen to fall, is not of vital importance to the candidate. For the men are not to vote as soldiers, but, separately, as citizens—the vote being counted to the State in which the soldier had his habitation before entering the service. The decision of the issue, now falling directly to the people, rests ultimately with the States as represented by the electors chosen on the 8th inst. Hence it is that so much importance attaches to the action of the Government in Louisiana, where the Federal authority extends no further than the range of its guns; and in Maryland, Kentucky, Arkansas, and Tennessee, where the population is divided in allegiance between the South and the North, and where, if the Federal armies were withdrawn, the Southern party would subdue the Union element, dismember or wholly disappear. As in these States no one will be allowed to vote who will not take an oath of "loyalty" and approval of the acts of Mr. Lincoln's Government, it follows that the Democratic party and the friends and supporters of General M'Clellan will be disfranchised by military pressure, and that in the electoral college these States will be counted for Mr. Lincoln. This is the great and paramount peril before the country. It would be useless to conceal the fact that Mr. Lincoln's advisers would, for the purposes of the election, consider Louisiana as much excluded from the electoral contest as Georgia or the Carolinas, and would further with the sabre and bayonet the Border States' process to the peace between hostile factions. In this case Mr. Lincoln might be defeated, but he would retire from the presidency with honour, and render it impossible for the friends of peace to say of him, that he preferred the risk of new and endless civil commotions to the peaceful relinquishment of a power which he was incompetent to wield and which the people had made up their minds to confer upon another.

At a meeting, held on Tuesday night, last, of a section of the Democratic party—which has broken loose from its old associates and connections and determines to support the vigorous prosecution of the war, and, consequently Mr. Lincoln as more likely than General M'Clellan to carry out the views of its members—it was proposed, as a future solution of a difficulty which threatens to be chronic, that a convention of the whole people of the States should be called to alter and amend the Constitution. The first amendment proposes the abolition of the Electoral Colleges, with the intention of delegating directly to the people the election of the President and Vice-President; and the second prohibits the re-election of a President or Vice-President for a second term. Were this the law and the Constitution at the present moment, there can be no doubt that a very imminent danger would be averted. But, however much admirable the plan might work in the future, it is totally inapplicable in the present. Even General Dix, its proposer, will not carry out his own principle to the extent of voting against Mr. Lincoln. On the contrary, he will not only support him, but will go, and has gone, out of his way, as Military Commander in the district of New York, to support him by extraneous and unconstitutional means. On the pretext that Southern refugees from Canada will cross over into the United States on Tuesday next to offer their votes at the polls, he has declared by military proclamation that he will take possession of all the polling-places on the Canadian frontier in order to preserve the peace. Such an interference as this is wholly gratuitous, and is a gross invasion of the rights and prerogative of Governor Seymour in New York and of the other local Governors in Vermont and Maine, who alone are charged with the duty of maintaining order and tranquillity in the States under their jurisdiction, and have militiamen at their command more than sufficient to meet any such danger as General Dix anticipates, even if it were as real as it is imaginary. The proclamation is one of many that has caused illfeeling, and done far more to diminish the chances of Mr. Lincoln than any act of Mr. Lincoln's opponents. In fact, Mr. Lincoln suffers far more from his friends than from his foes, and has not the courage—perhaps not the wish—to extricate himself from the net of injudicious counsel which they have woven and coiled around him.

Whatever may be the aggregate result of the vote in the Electoral Colleges—and it seems all but certain that Mr. Lincoln will be elected by a large majority—it is clear as a mathematical calculation that the great States of New York and Ohio will elect a college in favour of M'Clellan; and most probable that all the other wealthy and populous States of the Union, except the New England States, will do likewise. Mr. Lincoln's strength lies in New England (except in Connecticut), in the Western, North-Western, and Pacific States; in the new State of Nevada, admitted into the Union on the 1st instant; and in the Southern and Border States of which, or of a portion of which, the Federal troops hold temporary occupation.

P.S. General Dix's proclamation was doing so much harm to Mr. Lincoln that it has been withdrawn; it is asserted by express orders from Washington.

ADMIRALTY.

In connection with the recent successful actions in the Strait of Sicily, the following naval promotions have been made:—Commanders J. Moresby and A. J. Kingcote to be Captains; Lieut. H. E. Mulcaster, W. Hall, Hon. H. Keppel, H. Hervey, C. Harrington, and R. R. Tracy to be Commanders; Mr. J. D. Liddell, Second Master, to be Lieut.; Mr. R. L. Hall, Assistant-Surgeon, to be Surgeon.

By a recent Admiralty order a diver is appointed to every iron-clad ship.

Admiral G. Brine died on the 16th inst., at Richmond, in the eighty-fifth year of his age.

Mr. E. J. Reed, the chief constructor of the Navy, is making a short tour in the south of Europe for the benefit of his health, which for some time has been in a very delicate state.

One of the good results which has attended the visit of the Duke of Cambridge to Portsmouth is the abandonment, on the part of the Government, of the Malta Dock scheme.

The Marlborough, 121, screw line-of-battle ship, Captain Charles Fellowes; and the Ariel, 3, screw-sloop, Commander W. C. Chapman, are under orders to pay out of commission on Dec. 1.

The Victoria, screw iron-clad frigate, Captain the Hon. A. A. Cochrane, was minutely inspected on Monday by the Commander-in-Chief, Admiral Sir Alexander Milne, and the officers of the dockyard generally, in praise at the appearance of the crew and the excellent and cleanly condition of every part of the ship. She was paid out of commission on Monday under the supervision of Rear-Admiral Sydney Colpoys Dacres, C.B. The continuous-service men were sent to the Duncan, in lieu of Leander, and the ship will be placed in the second division of the steam reserve.

At Woolwich, yesterday week, a banquet was given by Major-General Lefroy, C.B., R.A., and the officers of the Royal Artillery officers' mess-room, to welcome General Todtleben, of the Russian Imperial Engineers, who had left for St. Petersburg. Amongst those present were Horse Guards, Major-General Wardle, the Brigade Major Deputy Assistant-Adjutant-General, and Assistant-Adjutant-General of the district, and others who distinguished themselves during the late Russian War. Admiral Sherard Osborn was also present, as was Mr. Reuter.

A large party of non-commissioned officers and men, of Major-General Lefroy's brigade, marched to the Royal Artillery barracks at Gravesend, from the troop-ship Robert Small, Captain Dark, which sailed from Malta on the 5th inst. for Sydney. The detachment consisted of the non-commissioned officers and privates of the 3rd Dragoon Guards, 6th Dragoons, Royal Engineers and Royal Artillery, who have completed their period of foreign service. The 12th Hussars (19/34) is second on the list of cavalry regiments. The second battalion Coldstream Guards (1,000 strong) is now in the division of Guards, and is second on the list of the infantry regiments, having obtained 19 marks in excess of the 1,000 required. Lieutenant Hall, of the 1st Company of the 49th Foot, its figure of merit being 50·04; and the best man in the battalion is Private Hay (regimental No. 2,777). The 1st Battalion Rifle Brigade, who obtained 22 points in the first-class firing at Hythe, ranks fifth in the list of the 1st Battalions. The best marksman is Private D. Connors, of the 90th Foot, 57 points having been awarded to him in the first class. The 2nd Battalion 60th Rifles (King's Royal Rifle Corps) has improved by nearly one point in the firing of the past season, and the percentage of efficients in the battalion is now 99·6, which is the highest double that of the previous year. In the infantry, too, there has been an improvement in almost every stage of the musketry practice. The 1st Battalion itself chiefly in individual shooting, nearly one fourth of the whole Army having fired in the first class (viz., 247 per cent), and 13,764 men have been recommended for extra pay as "marksmen," being 4371 men in excess of the number which the sum of £16,671 7s. 6d. allotted to this purpose will pay.

The report on the schools of musketry at Hythe and Fleetwood is most satisfactory. During the year there were trained at those establishments 461 officers—viz., 3 of the Royal Navy, 24 of the cavalry, and 386 of the infantry, 1,353 non-commissioned officers and privates, and 10 volunteers of all ranks; being an increase of the numbers trained in the previous year of 47 officers and 306 of other ranks. Of the officers exercised 77 per cent passed into the first class, and 79 per cent of the other ranks. The number of sergeants who have undergone a course of instruction at the schools is 772, of which number 227, or 45 per cent, qualified for the appointment of sergeant instructors of musketry, this being an increase of 14 per cent on the last year of those named who received certificates.

There has been a great falling off this year in the attendance of volunteers in the two terms set apart for this force at each school. This is accounted for by the fact that nearly all volunteer corps are now provided with qualified sergeant instructors, and that most of the adjutants have been trained and hold certificates of qualification. General Hay remarks that this should not, however, prevent the officers and non-commissioned officers of the various corps qualifying themselves to superintend the rifle practice of their own companies.

THE VOLUNTEER MOVEMENT.

The Benchers of the Middle Temple have consented to grant the use of their hall for the volunteer dinner which is to be given on Tuesday next, the 29th inst.

The prize-shooting of the fourth company of the Finsbury Rifles took place at Ranelagh, on Monday, in the midst of a thick fog. The first prize, presented by Captain Gregory Turney, was won by Private Greenwood; the second, presented by Lieutenant Reiffe, by Private Gwarson; the third, presented by Sergeant Jeffreys, by Private Cox.

On Saturday last the 1st City of London Engineers mustered at the Islington quarters, and, after a short march, came down up the parade-ground for the purpose of the distribution of prizes. The following is a list of the prizes and the fortunate recipients:—First prize (for the best shot in the regiment): A silver cup, presented by Lieutenant Walker, and a silver medal, presented by Sergeant Cheese; Sapper Hertslet and Corporal Bishop having tied, this prize was divided between them. Second prize: A silver cup, the gift of Lieutenant L'Anse; won by Sapper Terry. Third prize: won by Sapper Coulson. Fourth: The Surrey company's Prizes—1, A silver cup, presented by Lieutenant Rose; won by Sapper Kingston. 2, A silver cup, presented by Mrs. Lieutenant Rose; won by Corporal Hill. 3, A silver centre-piece, presented by Lieutenant Rose; won by Private Gibson. After the distribution of the prizes, the corps, with a large number of visitors and representatives of other companies, marched down to an excellent dinner given by the members to the officers. A handsome silver cup was presented by Corporal Lasher, on behalf of the members of the Surrey company to Sergeant-Major Griffiths, as a token of esteem for the energetic and kind manner in which he has performed his duties.

A number of the marksmen of the 2nd Manchester Rifle Volunteers met on Saturday at the range of the regiment at Salford, to compete for a challenge cup presented by Lieutenant-Colonel Cunliffe. A sweepstakes was added, the whole to be fired into three prizes. Corporal J. Douglas and Private J. V. Maginn tied for the second and for the first prize; Corporal Douglas won the cup, Private Maginn taking the second prize. Corporal J. Hall won the third prize, and Sergeant Hamilton the fourth. The 56th (Salford) Lancashire Rifle Volunteers also concluded on Saturday last. Captain Makin and Lieutenant Sharratt tied for the first prize, the former, making the lowest number of points, winning the cup, Lieutenant Sharratt taking the second prize. There was a tie for the third and fourth prizes, between Sergeants Preston and Hall, Sergeant Preston winning the third prize. The first prize of the second-class awards was won by Private W. B. Jones. The first prize taken by Private Hall, second; Private Bowden, third; and Sergeant Preston fourth. The first of the third-class prizes was won by Private Mason, second, Private Brundrit, third, and Private Hall, fourth. The first prizes for the fourth prize between Privates Naylor, Buckley, and Arnold, and the quantity was divided accordingly.—The meeting of the Lancashire Brigade of the 1st Manchester assembled at the Fallowfield shooting-range last Saturday to compete for the company, regimental, and brigade prizes, for the highest numbers. Four money prizes were added to the competition for the cup. Corporal Green and Lance Corporal Ryan tied for the cup and the first money prize, and, on shooting off, Sergeant Green won, Lance Corporal Byrne taking the second prize; the third prize was taken by Private Hoop, his fourth by Private W. Cartman.

TRIAL OF RIFLES AT WOOLWICH.

The annual trial of various descriptions of rifles began on Tuesday, under the management of the Small-Arms Committee, the object of which trials is to obtain the best possible description of firearm, to be used in the competition at the Wimbledon ranges at the Volunteer prize-meeting. All gunmakers are invited to attend and compete on these occasions. The contest has each year grown more and more keen. The Secretary of State, with the full support of the association, obtained an easy victory over the regulation Enfield, but in each succeeding year the competitors have run it very close. The speed last year it was beaten very decidedly in some of the ranges, though, upon the whole shooting, it proved to be much the better weapon. The inventor, Mr. Whitworth has disappeared from the scene. He did not appear as one of the competitors. Those who have been engaged with the struggle between Sir W. Armstrong and himself with the great guns at Shoeburyness and Portsmouth, The Natural Philosopher, Lord Rosse, Lord Elcho, the Earl of Aberdeen, Earl Ducie, Captain Hildmay (the secretary of the association), Captain Boxer, Captain Ross, and others, Mr. Rigby, of Dublin, and Mr. Henry, of Edinburgh, were the only two gunmakers present. Before commencing the trials, and on testing the instruments to be used in the contest, the gun of Mr. Henry was one two-thousandth of an inch out of gauge, and he was accordingly declared to be disqualified. Mr. Rigby had, consequently, a walk over. He fired through the three concessed thirty shots at the 1000 yards range, and the mean deviation at the target was found to be—in the first series, 7·21 in the second, 7·19; and the third was reckoned at 2·80. The result was that the rifle of Mr. Rigby was adopted by the committee, and it will be used for firing through the long ranges at the next Wimbledon meeting. Mr. Henry protested against the decision, however, and says that the only cause he can make who ought to have been allowed to test his rifle, on the ground that the gun of Mr. Rigby was not of the regulation—had it been, it was incomplete; for it had not that degree of polish and finish which would be accepted as one of the prize rifles at the Wimbledon meeting. He also objected on the ground that Mr. Rigby was not at the range by the exact time fixed by the association.

THE EARTHQUAKE IN ITALY.—The Constitutionnel supplies the following particulars:—"In the capital the oscillations, which were first from north to south, and then from east to west, were preceded by that trembling movement which renders such phenomena so formidable. Some tall buildings in the quarter of Monte Citorio suffered, but no loss of life took place. At Perolia the consequences were more serious. A letter from that town, dated the 3rd, states that the first shock was felt there about seven in the forty seconds. The capuls and a part of the tower of the church of San-Agostino, the scriptorium of the library, and a portion of the convent of San Juan de Dieo, and a large number of houses, all fell to the ground. The total number of victims was at that time known to be 40, but seventeen were killed or wounded, and twenty-nine of the inhabitants had been taken to the hospitals, more or less severely injured. According to telegraphic despatches received in the capital, the earthquake was felt with more or less violence on the whole line of the coast from Rome to Ancona, and also at Rieti, Narni, Orvieto, Corsleto, and La Soledad. A communication from Telmacan mentions that great damage was done in that town. Nearly all the belfries in the place and the Townhall lie in ruins, and a large number of houses were in a tottering condition. In the province of Aquila the cathedral and the church of the church tower recently erected was thrown down, and the walls of a number of houses rendered in a dangerous state."

THREE CHILDREN LOST IN THE BUSH.—The following touching story is told by the correspondent of the Argus:—"Some weeks back, at the station of Mr. Dugald Smith, at Horsham, two boys, aged nine and five, and a girl, aged seven, the children of a carpenter, Duff, wandered into the bush and were lost. They had been sent out by their mother, as they had often gone out before to fetch cows from the neighbouring run, and returning before dark, the parents became alarmed, and a search commenced. The father, assisted by friends and neighbours in large numbers, scoured the country in every direction for nights and days in vain. At length, in despair, the assistance of some aborigines was called in. These people, possessing to an almost bloodhound instinct in following up the very faintest tracks. The blacks soon came upon the footprints of the wanderers, expatiated on those trackers always do, at every bent twig, or flattened tuft of grass, on the apparent settlings of the dew-drops on their native feet—they did not, however, dig one kneel down, carry him stong. Here travel all night; dark; are not disturbed. Here lie under, on, and more whimpering. 'Here little one tired again;' big one kneel down; no able to rise, fall flat on his face. The scrutiny and searchings of the blacks were afterwards curiously corroborated by the children themselves. On the eighth day after they were lost, the collective recollection of the famished band, consisting of being again seen alive, the searching party came on them. They are described as having been found lying on the ground, the youngest in the middle, clasped by the youngest in the middle, carefully wrapped in her sister's frock. The elder boy, who had been dead some days, and was rapidly recovering. They were without food, and, by their own account, drank water only once during the whole time they were out, and this was from the Friday of one week until the Saturday of the next week; in all, nine days and eight nights."

EFFECTS OF THE CYCLONE AT CALCUTTA.

In our last week's Paper we gave an Illustration of the terrible havoc caused by the cyclone or revolving hurricane of Oct. 5 among the crowded shipping in the River Hooghly, at the port of Calcutta. We have thought it worth while to publish in this Number a couple more views of that extraordinary scene, which are engraved from the photographs taken on the spot by Mr. Wagentreiber. The particulars of the disaster were so fully related in our former account that it is needless to repeat the description. It may be added that, from a report to the Meteorological Society of Calcutta, it appears that the pressure of the wind at one moment during this storm amounted to as much as thirty-two pounds on the square inch. Some notion of its comparative force may be obtained, if this estimate be correct, from the records of the most violent gales experienced of late years in our own country, as the maximum pressure then attained was forty-three pounds to the square foot.

VIEWS IN BORNEO.

KUCKING FORT, SARAWAK.

We have engraved this week two more Illustrations of the scenery of Sarawak, the seat of Sir James Brooke's Government in Borneo; and these, as well as the two published in our Journal of the 5th inst., are from the sketches with which we were favoured by Mr. Frederick Boyle. The name of "Kucking," as we have explained, belongs to the town upon the river Sarawak, which is the centre of a province formerly ruled by one of the Malay Princes in virtual independence of the Sultan of Borneo. The old fort of Kucking having been captured, after a gallant resistance, by the Chinese insurgents some years ago, the building shown in our first Engraving has been erected in a stronger position. This modern fort is of wood, with a deep but narrow moat round it; and contains, besides the Resident and his household, twenty-four footmen armed with rifles. It is quite capable of defence against any native force. The old fort is now the residence of the treasurer. Our second Illustration is a view of Government House, which stands directly opposite the present fort; the river being here about 250 yards broad.

THE EMANCIPATION OF THE RUSSIAN SERFS.

The Russian journals contain details respecting the progress of the emancipation of the serfs up to the month of August last, at which date it would appear that there were only eight regulating charters still uncompleted, while 111,568 have been already brought into execution; and these refer to estates on which already reside 10,001,220 country people. The most circumstantial details have been received respecting 109,750 of these charters, relating to estates on which 9,776,017 country people reside. A third of these charters (33,544) cause the total cessation from the present of all transitory relations in regard to 4,021,878 people, the half of the freed serfs, who thus find themselves completely liberated from their former masters. As many as 2,133,943 people have come into complete possession of their plots of land, and of this number 436,702 have required no assistance from the State. In the nine western provinces all the country people, without exception, have become proprietors, which fact is to be attributed to the particular condition attending the situation of these provinces. Of the rest of Russia, the province of Kharkof holds the first rank as regards the progress of reform. The number of its country people entirely freed, and to whom territorial property has been given, represents 72 per cent of the total of its former serfs. Next follow the provinces of Ecatherinoslaf, of the Tauride, of Voronege, Kherson, Kazan, and Tchernigoff, where the number is from 51 to 62 per cent. At Orenburg the number is 49 per cent. At Saratof, Simbirsk, Poltawa, Don, Samara, Perm, and Viatka it is 34 to 44 per cent. At Penza the number is 32 per cent, at Koursk and Tambof more than 22 per cent, and at Smolensk 19 per cent. In the other provinces of Russia the number of country people who have become absolute proprietors is below 15 per cent. In the governments of St. Petersburg and Moscow it varies between 10 and 11 per cent. This is considered to be a very satisfactory result after three years' trial of the system; and the work of emancipation is looked upon as entirely achieved.

GOVERNMENT HOUSE, SARAWAK.

MEMBERS OUT OF PARLIAMENT.

No doubt Mr. Disraeli has always concurred with that apothegm of a great lawyer who was leader of the Western Circuit, that the further he went West the better he understood how it was the wise men came into the East. Probably that concurrence will sarcastically occur to him mild, and receive additional confirmation when he finds that he has absolutely been made the subject of a joke by Sir Lawrence Palk. That very worthy and very ponderous representative of a western county has been for once inspired into a new line of wit that fatal sheep. It is difficult to imagine how the creature Palk managed the necessary intonation, for his voice is singularly free from humour. The groaning tones lively figure which, we must now assume, occasionally slept, spiritual, confessional, for it is as much a part of his unconscious is an obstacle to fastidiousness, and it was loud and hearty of Sir Lawrence to do so much to overcome the difficulties of Woodbury the other day. They seemed high to him, and with the spirit of the fox-hunter who looked from the comparison of Mr. Disraeli's so far as could be made out, Mr. Coleridge, politically considered, was likened to the probable issue of a fast unhungry cross. There are far worse county members than Sir Lawrence Palk, who, if he is not lively, is not dead of good sense, and who has taken up in Parliament a question which is one of the days—that of improving the condition of labourers' cottages. If we remember rightly, a bill which he brought in with that object did not succeed because it did not sufficiently conserve the rights or the supposed interests of landlords; and therefore, coming from a large landed proprietor, it may be taken to have been dictated by a feeling worthy of such position. It is not to be wondered at that his constituents are willing to laugh with him if he show a desire to ask their sympathies in that way.

The annual invocation of the shade of Colston, the great benefactor of Bristol, seems to have been far less stirring than usual, so far as the speeches were concerned. It is a solemn occasion, and always makes this commemoration assume a duel—nay, a treble—character. In the abstract, Whigs, Tories, and Radicals unite to laugh the obsequies celebrate Colston; but the charity of the original benefactor, and the wisdom of the present stewardship in Bristol as to enable all political parties to meet together in one assembly and to utter their voices in the same tone. They do not, however, that so one of the objects of this gathering is to get subscriptions for charities, and therefore, we would be likely to be obtained if they were made to contact, though for political witnesses; and that is the reason why the speeches distinctly The Liberals and the Conservatives exhibited this was especially the case. Both sides seem

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS.

LORD MANNERS.

The Right Hon. John Thomas Manners-Sutton, second Baron Manners, of

Foston, in the county of Lincoln, died at Hastings on the 14th inst., from an illness supposed to have been caused by an injury to the head, the result of a serious fall while riding in Hyde Park, a few years ago. His Lordship was great-grandson of John, third Duke of Rutland, K.G., and was by his second wife, June, only daughter of James Butler, of Kilcash, in the county of Tipperary, and first Earl of Glengall (he was only child of the Right Hon. Thomas Manners-Sutton, a distinguished barrister, who, after serving the offices of Solicitor-General and a Baron of the Exchequer in England, was transferred to Ireland in 1807, as Lord Chancellor, with the title of Baron Manners. His son, the present Lord, the subject of this notice, was born in Dublin on Aug. 17, 1818, and succeeded his father on May 31, 1842. He was a Captain in the West Suffolk Militia, and a Deputy-Lieutenant of Suffolk, in which county he once held a prominent position as resident owner of Fornham, near Bury St. Edmunds. He married, on Sept. 21, 1843, Lydia Sophia, eldest daughter of Captain William Bateman Dashwood, R.N., and by her, who survives him, leaves a youthful family of four sons and three daughters. He is succeeded by his eldest son, John Thomas, now third Lord Manners, a youth in his fifteenth year. The first Lord Manners, the Chancellor referred to, was the Peer just dead, was fifth son of the third Duke of Rutland's third son, Lord George Manners-Sutton, who, in 1762, inherited the estates and assumed the name of his maternal grandfather, Robert Sutton, Baron Lexington. Lord George's fourth son was Charles, D.D., Archbishop of Canterbury, whose eldest son was the late Speaker of the House of Commons, the Right Hon. Charles Manners-Sutton, G.C.B., created Viscount Canterbury.

THE DOWAGER MARCHIONESS OF QUEENSBERRY.

The Most Noble, Sarah, Marchioness of Queensberry, who died on the 13th inst., at 1, Arewacke-street, aged seventy-six, was the eldest daughter of Major James Sholto Douglas, by his wife Sarah, daughter of James Dawes, Esq., of Rockspring, Jamaica. Her Ladyship was married, in the 11th of July, 1811, to her cousin, John Johnstone, sixth Marquis of Queensberry, who died on the 17th of December, 1856, leaving by her (with a daughter, Lady Georgina Douglas) an only son, Archibald William, P.C., his successor, as seventh Marquis of Queensberry, and father of John Sholto, the present Marquis.

COLONEL DAWKINS.

Henry Dawkins, Esq., a Colonel in the Army, and formerly of the Coldstream Guards, the head and representative of the old and well-known family of Dawkins of Over Norton, in the county of Oxford, who died on the 15th inst. at his family seat, Over Norton, aged Seventy-four Norton, Over, was the eldest son of Henry Dawkins, Esq., of Over Norton, M.P. for Aldborough, by his wife, Georgiana, daughter of General Sir Henry Clinton, G.C.B. He was born on the 28th of November, 1788, and was educated at Harrow School, and at Marlow College. He entered the Army as Ensign in the Coldstream Guards on the 16th of March, 1804. He was appointed Adjutant in that regiment on the 14th of April, 1808; and became Captain of a Company on the 18th of June, 1810; and Captain and Lieutenant-Colonel on the 29th of July, 1814. He retired from the Army in 1846. Colonel Dawkins was present with the second brigade of Guards during the retreat of the French army from Santarem in 1811, and at the battle of Fuentes d'Onor in the same year. He was engaged at the passage of Ciudad Rodrigo, in 1812; also at the Battle of Salmanaca and siege of Badajos, in the same year; at the Battle of Vittoria, in 1813; at the passage of the Nive and Nivelle and at the crossing of the Adour River, in 1814; and also during the whole of the operations before Bayonne in that year, being badly wounded at the enemy's sortie from the latter place. He was also with his company at the Battle of Waterloo and the engagements which led to it, and remained with the army of occupation. Colonel Dawkins received the war medal, with six clasps, for the battles of Vittoria, Salamanca, Ciudad Rodrigo, Fuentes d'Onor, and also the medal for Waterloo. He became a Colonel, Jan. 10, 1837. Colonel Dawkins married Georgiana, eldest of Sir Plantagenet Brydges, Esq., of Coppyne, in the county of York, and niece of Charles, first Lord Feversham, by whom he leaves surviving issue two sons and two daughters. He is succeeded by his elder son, Lieutenant-Colonel William Gregory Dawkins, Coldstream Guards, a gallant officer who served with distinction in the Legion of Honour, who was born in 1825. This family of Dawkins, originally from Leicestershire, subsequently for a time in Wales, and finally of Over Norton, Oxon, has been for centuries of importance from its high alliances and its military and Parliamentary merit. In the Long Parliament Sir Thomas Dawkins was M.P. for Hindon, Wilts, the celebrated traveller in Asia Minor, who discovered the ruins of Palmyra and Baalbec, and published illustrations of both these two famous cities. He died, unmarried, in 1717; and was grand-uncle of the Col. Dawkins just deceased.

WILLS AND BEQUESTS.

The will of Mrs. Lydia Symons, wife of the Rev. Benjamin Parsons Symons, D.D., Warden of Wadham College, Oxford, was proved in London under £20,000. The executors nominated are her husband, Henry Masterman and Edward Masterman, Esqrs. The testatrix leaves the property over which she had power of appointment by her husband also by the will of her late father, John Masterman, Esq.—subject to her husband's life interest therein—amongst her children and sisters and brothers, and appointing her said brothers, Henry and Edward, residuary legatees. There are bequests in the following testamentary words:—To the London Society for the Conversion of the Jews and the Church Pastoral Aid Society, each a legacy of £500; and to the Church Missionary Society, £1,000.

The will of William Stitt Wilson, Esq., banker, of the city of Norwich, formerly of Whitehaven, Cumberland, Gloucester-place, London on the 1st inst., the executors appointed being his brother-in-law, Thomas Brown, Esq., of Ipswich, Cumberland, and William Wilson, Esq., of Workington. The personalty was sworn under £25,000. The will is dated 1868, and there are four codicils, dated 1869. The principal portion of the property was left, having died before the testator, the personalty devolves, by the terms of the will, to his two executors, in trust for one and benefit, and they are left also the freehold property. The estate of Cockfield is devised to his said brother-in-law, Mr. Thomas Brown, the brother of his late wife. There is a legacy of £1000 to the East of England Banking Company. Legacies are left to several friends, and also to the Whitehaven Infirmary, £100; to the South Kensington Museum, an antique carved chimney-piece lately removed from Cockfield Hall, dated 1617; to the British Museum, the choice of nine articles of virtu from his collection; to the National Gallery, any two oil paintings the trustees may select.

The will of Richard Gibbs, Esq., late of the city of London, barrister-at-law, of Upper Tooting, who died on the 6th inst., at his house there, on the 8th of October, by his relict, the sole executrix. The personalty was sworn under £100,000. After making several pecuniary bequests, the testator devises to the residue of his property, with power of disposition over a certain portion. The ultimate reversionary interest is given to his wife, on the death of the survivor, to his relict, the sole executrix. The personalty was sworn under £100,000. After making several pecuniary bequests, the testator devises to the residue of his property, with power of disposition over a certain portion. The ultimate reversionary interest is given to his wife, on the death of the survivor, to his relict, the sole executrix. The personalty was sworn under £100,000. A testator, who died on the 6th of October, by his relict, the sole executrix. The personalty was sworn under £100,000. A making several pecuniary bequests, from which annuities of various amounts to twelve persons are to be kept up, the bequests being to individuals who had been or were in his employ; and on the decease of these annuitants the principal sum of £10,000 will revert to twenty-three similar substitutions. The legatees are numerous, and the sums are to be paid free of duty. There are specific bequests of pictures, &c., to many of his friends, members of the Old Water-Colour Society, and the National. To each of his clerks who have been four years in his employ he leaves a legacy of £100, and £50 to each of his clerks who have been less than four years. Legacies to his servants. His business, carried on under the firm of Messrs. Gibbs and Co., he states, he has entered into with his son, and in case of the assistance of his partner, has not with success, after many years of indomitable perseverance and industry, and of the conclusion of which are these words, "I thank Almighty God for inclining my heart from childhood to feel for others' woes." The will bears date July 4, 1864.

One pleasing and hopeful feature in our Canadian colony is the rapid and steady strides with which education is progressing. Taking a period of eleven years—from 1859 to 1861, for example—the educational progress appears remarkable, if not unparalleled. Within this comparatively brief time the grammar schools have increased by thirty-one and the pupils by 2500, while the common schools exhibit an increase of 910 buildings and 103,921 pupils. In 1859 the number of free schools was but 2827; in 1869 they numbered 3736. The augmentation of attendance at schools is very noticeable, and favourably compares with some of the most flourishing School States. During the eleven years specified that increase is in the following ratio:—Pennsylvania, 38 per cent; State of New York, 8 per cent; Massachusetts, 30 per cent; Upper Canada, 168 per cent. Even in the matter of school moneys Canada leaves precedence of those States—the increase for ten years being, in Pennsylvania, 4 per cent; State of New York, 145 per cent; Massachusetts, 66 per cent; and Canada West, 222 per cent.—*English America, by S. BREAKFAST BEVERAGE.—Homœopathic practitioners, and the medical profession generally, recommend HOMŒOPATHIC COCOA as the best of all beverages. While the doctrine of homœopathy was first introduced into this country by Hahnemann, the Homœopathic Cocoa was first introduced to the taste of the public by JAMES EPPS, and was either supplied in the crude state or as unskilfully manufactured as to disturb the digestion. In 1839 JAMES EPPS, homœopathic chemist, established, in the year 1839, to turn his attention to this subject, and after many years' study and research succeeded in producing a beverage for the general use of invalids, which, delicately nourished, and refined by the perfect trituration which it receives in the process it passes through in the manufacture, is the delicate cocoa of commerce.

EPPS'S HOMŒOPATHIC COCOA is distinguished as an invigorating and grateful Breakfast and Supper Beverage.—The Herald, in his work "Food and its Adulterations," says:—"Cocoa contains a great variety of valuable constituents, and is one of the most nutritious of the farinaceous articles of food." Again, "As a nutritive, cocoa stands very much higher than either coffee or tea."—Sold only in packets, labelled JAMES EPPS, homœopathic chemist, filled up with boiling water or milk. Secured in tin-lined 1lb., ½lb., and ¼lb. packets, by JAMES EPPS, homœopathic chemist, 112, Great Russell-street, and 170, Piccadilly, Westminster, London, and Threadneedle-street, Manufactory, Euston-road, London. Sold by Grocers, Confectioners, and Chemists.

EPPS'S CHOCOLATE, IN STICKS and DROPS, for EATING. Also Homœopathic Cocoa Nibs, a highly nutritive and easily DELICIOUS, ECONOMICAL, AND NUTRITIOUS.

J. S. FRY and SONS, Makers to the Queen and Prince of Wales.

FRY'S CHOCOLATE and COCOA, for Breakfast and Supper, are articles that have been attested by uniform public approbation for a century.

DEMOLITION OF BLACKFRIARS BRIDGE.—SEE NEXT PAGE.

IRELAND AND THE NEW LORD LIEUTENANT.

We gladly seize the occasion of the banquet given by the Lord Mayor of Dublin in entertainment of Lord Wodehouse, the new Lord Lieutenant, for drawing the attention of our readers to Ireland. There is, as everyone knows, a strong tendency in most people to invest with a livelier interest things that are at a great distance from us than such as are familiar to us and close at hand; and "the sister isle" comes in for the disadvantage of this easily besetting sin. Curiosity about what is going on in Japan, in New Zealand, in Madagascar, or even in some of the small islands of the Pacific, is more common to the journalreading portion of the British public than desire to ascertain what is passing on the other side of St. George's Channel. The inhabitants of Ireland, naturally enough, are apt to draw larger inferences from the fact than it will warrant. They do not make sufficient allowance for the force of a disposition characteristic, not of Englishmen only, but of human nature, which prompts them to lend a readier attention to what appeals to their imagination than to what comes within the purview of their knowledge. If Ireland, instead of being within two or three hours' sail of us, had been located at the antipodes, and if her history were less bound up with our own, probably we should have studied all the phases of her social condition with more zeal and patience than, for the most part, have been exhibited in our pursuit of information touching her concerns. But when we have made this confession we have confessed the worst. We are not, as a people, justly chargeable with any feeling of aversion or with any hostile prejudice to this portion of her Majesty's dominions. We hear gladly of Irish prosperity. We regret sincerely when evidence of Irish distress is placed before us. We wish the sister country to enjoy every constitutional and political privilege which we prize for ourselves. We should be thankful to witness the development of all her rich resources. We are not conscious of the slightest antagonism towards her nor jealousy of her. We disclaim all unkindness of spirit in reference to her affairs. But, considering the matter in large, we can hardly clear ourselves from the charge of negligence and want of due consideration in regard to the current topics in which she is specially interested.

We suspect that in this, as in most other instances, our faults lies enfolded upon us its own appropriate punishment. Ireland no doubt, has been the greater sufferer; but England has sustained no inconsiderable loss. There lies at our feet, if we may say so, a small but compact territory, capable of becoming the most dazzling gem in the crown of British royalty. Its climate, its geographical position, its mineral wealth, its unrivalled fisheries, its broad estuaries and capacious harbours, give it all the physical requisites to national wealth and enjoyment. Effectually drained, as the set of its land for the most part enables it to be, it would constitute, for its size, one of the most magnificent pastoral regions in the world; with a highly-remunerative and unlimited market close beside it. Its fisheries are so abundant that, whenever they shall be made available, they are capable of supplying not only the inhabitants of Ireland, but of England also, with a cheap and wholesome addition to the dietary of the poorest. Its mineral products, if fairly worked, might immensely augment its income. Its staple manufacture of linen shows, at least, that there is no inherent impotence in the Irish people for the organisation of manufacturing industry. The indentation of its coasts, and the accessibility, capacity, and security of several of its ports, point it out as a fitting seat of extended commerce. What it might have been made, compared with what it actually is, may well suggest to the people of this country that neglect of Ireland has deprived both the Irish and themselves of the chief benefits of the most splendid inheritance placed by the bounty of Divine Providence within their reach.

A long period of misrule, now, we trust, passed away for ever, has entailed upon us the terrible but righteous penalty of disqualifying for the present task of repairing the mischief we have done the good that we would. Popular disrespect for public law is the wide-spread result of a century and a half of law based upon injustice. We have removed the cause—we cannot all at once obliterate the effects. Even now, when there exists on all sides a disposition to extend to Ireland the unexpected advantage of just and enlightened government, the Irish people, full of the traditional wrongs of the past, part but slowly with the evil habits which oppression had wrought into their nature, and are more intent upon exiling themselves from the soil of their forefathers than of settling with the happier prospects which the new order of things has opened for them in their own country. Wherever beyond the seas the English language is spoken, thither Irishmen have been flocking, for the last ten years, with enmity to England in their hearts. We must bear the punishment as best we may. The sins of the fathers are visited upon their children, and the present generation of England, who have wished to sow only good seed, are reaping the harvest of the bad seed sown broadcast by their predecessors. There is no help for it. Patience and redoubled effort are not only remedy. It is very disappointing, no doubt; but we may not petulantly throw up the responsibility which the misdeeds of our own kith and kin have rendered it such an ungrateful task to discharge.

Nor have we any good ground for believing that the future prosperity of Ireland lies beyond the compass of our ability. The Irish people are possessed of all the indigenous attributes of mind, and even of character, necessary to a great and thriving community. They have quick perceptions, great versatility of mental power, sensitive sympathies, warm affections. They are capable of the most plodding industry. There is scarcely any mode of employment for which they are naturally disqualified. Their want of self-reliance, and their irreverent feelings towards law are adventitious—the deposit of events, not the growth of innate tendencies—capable of yielding, and, indeed, actually yielding, to counteractive influences. Ireland, in spite of the disadvantages of which she has been the unhappy victim, is not now what she was thirty years ago, will not be thirty years hence what she is now. Soothing and salutary influences are telling upon her; slowly, it is true, and with intermittent relapses; nevertheless, it is clear to those who watch her daily history that a change for the better is gradually advancing. Three unpropitious seasons in succession following hard upon a brief interval of commencing prosperity have had a depressing effect upon the character of the people, as well as upon the condition of the country. They have disclosed the secret that exclusive attention to agriculture renders the continuous well-being and growth of a nation precarious; but they have not utterly destroyed the elasticity of the hope which preceded them. Like the great famine, they have taught with impressive unity a much-needed lesson; but the very facts which show that the lesson has been understood forbid us to despair of a brighter and more genial future.

The festivities with which the new Lord Lieutenant has been welcomed by the city of Dublin bring out into unusual prominence the more hopeful characteristics of the condition of the sister isle. The lights of the picture were, of course, whole more of on such an occasion than the shadows; although the playful banter which passed between the outgoing Lord Mayor and the Chief Secretary, Sir Robert Peel, make us cognisant of the fact that the principal officers of the Irish Administration are sensible enough that the shadows are broad and deep. When, however, we find the Lord Lieutenant dwelling upon the importance of fostering manufacturing industry in Ireland, and the Chief Secretary pledging his best efforts to give the country the benefit of a general system of railways, and when we recollect that Ireland is already traversed by a complete system of railway communication, we cannot but augur favourably of the coming destiny of the country. Lord Wodehouse has before him a rare opportunity for constructive statesmanship, and we mistake the country greatly if he do not signalise his term of viceroyalty by solid achievements. His predecessor, the Earl of Carlisle, has done much towards preparing the soil for the reception of the living germs of social and national amelioration; and Lord Wodehouse, we are convinced, will know how to cultivate the crop of any advantages that have been bequeathed to him. Under the guidance of his statesman-like mind, and the impulse communicated by his far-reaching energy, we think it not unlikely that the fortunes of Ireland may be permanently mended, and that solid foundations may be laid upon which succeeding generations of our children will witness the uprearing of a glorious superstructure of national prosperity.

The people of this country can, if they will, lend no small assistance in the prosecution of this enterprise. They will not be required to do much. They have only to surround them an atmosphere of encouraging and stimulating public opinion. The highest and most competent statesmen work all the better when they are conscious that their efforts attract the regard and command the approval of their fellowcountrymen. The most spirit-stricken people revive when they become fully aware that their struggle with the difficulties that surround them is sympathisingly watched by those whose lot is happier than their own. When once our Irish countrymen shall be convinced that we care sincerely for them, interest ourselves in their condition, and cherish hope of their progress, they will feel the force of a new motive. They will inhale an element which will give nourishment and strength to their self-respect. They will become conscious of a novel and improved position. This is the duty we owe them. Thus we may help to blot out from their national state and prospects the traces of England's past injustice and repented-of oppression. Ireland has a right to ask some indulgence at our hands. We have contributed to make her what she is: let us rejoice to aid her in becoming what she can and should be.

DEMOLITION AND REBUILDING OF BLACKFRIARS BRIDGE.

THE Engraving on our front page, from a sketch taken in the evening on the Surrey bank of the Thames, shows a view of the remains of old Blackfriars Bridge and the scaffolding which has been erected at once to facilitate the demolition of the superstructure and the erection of a new bridge. This view includes the temporary wooden bridge now used for the public accommodation; beyond which is the iron bridge of the London, Chatham, and Dover Railway. The double work of taking away the old stone bridge, and building that which is to supply its place, is being carried on by Messrs. Peto, Brassey, and Co., the contractors, who are bound to finish it within three years. A large number of workmen are employed, chiefly under the superintendence of Mr. F. W. Bryant, the agent for the contractors; and at this season, when the days are so short, they have to work in the evening by the light of magnificent lamps. The stone of the old bridge is, for the most part, being taken by barges to Messrs. Thomas's wharf, Rotherhithe, though a small portion of it may be used for the masonry of the foundations and abutments of the new bridge, the excavations for which have already been commenced. A novel feature in the embankment undertakings here and in the introduction of steam-cranes, which will raise any railway laid along the banks at the top of the scaffolding, and are thus enabled to lift and carry the largest blocks of stone with the greatest facility from the barges moored on either within the extent of these works. Three openings, each 70 ft. wide, are reserved for navigation, as in the case of Waterloo, Southwark, and Beaut. The old bridge, of which the remains are so quickly disappearing, was built about a hundred years ago, having been commenced in 1760 and finished in 1769.

The following are the final arrangements of the Judges for the Winter Assize:—Oxford Circuit: Judge, Mr. Justice Byles—Shaftesbury, Thursday, Dec. 1; Worcester and city, Monday, Dec. 12; Oxford, Saturday, Dec. 17; Reading, Wednesday, Dec. 21. FRANCE.

The appeal of the thirteen Deputies and others charged with an illegal electoral association, whose houses were broken into by the police and who were convicted last spring, is before the Imperial Court of Paris.

The Constitutionnel says the Emperor has expressed to M. de Persigny his regret that, in a letter to M. Girardin, he had manifested a desire to see some modifications introduced in the press laws.

M. Guizot is in Paris superintending the publication of the seventh volume of his memoirs.

A letter from Cannes says:—"Lord Brougham, M. Victor Cousin, and M. Prosper Mérimée have arrived here to pass the winter."

A new paper, Le Jockey—sporting, social, and artistic—has appeared in Paris.

As a sale which took place in the Rue Drouot, last week, the celebrated bourgliges belonging to Henri II. was sold for 2000*l*.

M. Texier states that Baron Haussmann proposes to plant along the Paris boulevards, all the way from the Barrière de Clichy to the Barrière de l'Etoile, a row of bronze statues of the great men and women of French history, from its earliest date.

The Moniteur publishes a long list of persons on whom medals have been conferred for acts of benevolence. Among them is a lad of thirteen, named Diné, who saved a child from drowning in the Seine.

An explosion took place on Sunday at a percussion-cap and cartridge manufactory, at Meudon, near Paris. Six men were killed.

The election of members of the councils and consistories of the Protestant churches throughout France is to take place on the last Sundays in the course of January next.

It appears from statistics lately published that the population of France, when the census was taken in 1861, amounted to 37,382,255 souls, not including the population of Algeria, the colonies, and the foreigners residing in France.

A Foreign Office letter explains the plan on which the reduction of the duty on the export of rags from France is to be effected. At present the duty stands at 12*f*. per 100 kilogrammes. The first reduction will take effect on the 1st of January, 1866, when the duty will be reduced to 9*f*. On the 1st of January, 1868, it will be lowered to 8*f*.; and in twelve months afterwards to 4*f*.

SPAIN.

A Ministerial circular has been published ordering that the press laws are to be rigorously enforced now that the elections are over. The result of the elections is favourable to the Moderate Liberal party.

The Epoca says that the Minister of Finance has investigated the resources of the country, and decided that they are equal to bear the charges on the revenue up to the end of the year.

The Queen in Council has decided to banish to the Canary Islands the Infante Don Enrique, brother of the King Consort. The cause being, according to the Pensamiento Español, a letter he had addressed to the King and Queen, in which he offered advices on public and family matters, and showing a great want of courtesy and respect. The banishment is to continue during the Queen's pleasure, and the sentence was at once carried into effect (on the 24th ult.), much to the Infante's surprise, who wished, when too late, to retract and apologise. The affair nevertheless has caused a sensation in Madrid.

ITALY.

The report of the committee of the Senate warmly approves the Franco-Italian Convention and opposes the adoption of the bill for the transfer of the capital to Florence.

The Senate has passed the Financial Bill by 108 against 27 votes.

In the Chamber of Deputies the Minister of the Interior brought forward a bill for authority to promulgate throughout the kingdom the civil maritime and commercial code, and the duties on public and family matters, and showing a great want of courtesy and respect. The official Gazette publishes a fresh list of municipalities who have anticipated the payment of the land tax for 1865.

The Turin journals publish the text of a bill to be submitted to the Italian Parliament for the suppression of conventual and monastic establishments, and assigning a charge to the potential income on a graduated scale, chargeable on existing land revenues. There is a clause restricting the operations of the measure ordered.

A despatch from Rome reports that Signor Pacheco, the new Spanish Ambassador, has had an audience of the Pope to present his credentials.

AUSTRIA.

The draught of the address of the Upper House of the Reichsrath, in reply to the Emperor's speech, expresses a hope that the Hungarian and Croatian Diets may be convened after the closing of the session and that even the Venetian and Galician Diets may be assembled before long. The address alludes to the Schleswig-Holstein question, and urges the Government to endeavour to aid the Duchies in establishing their rights with regard to the succession and in effecting the independence of their own affairs. It declares that a measure establishing Ministerial responsibility is greatly needed to complete the Austrian Constitution. Several other topics are touched upon in the address, which generally embodies enlightened opinions.

The Minister of Commerce has introduced a bill for the construction of a Transylvanian railway.

DENMARK AND GERMANY.

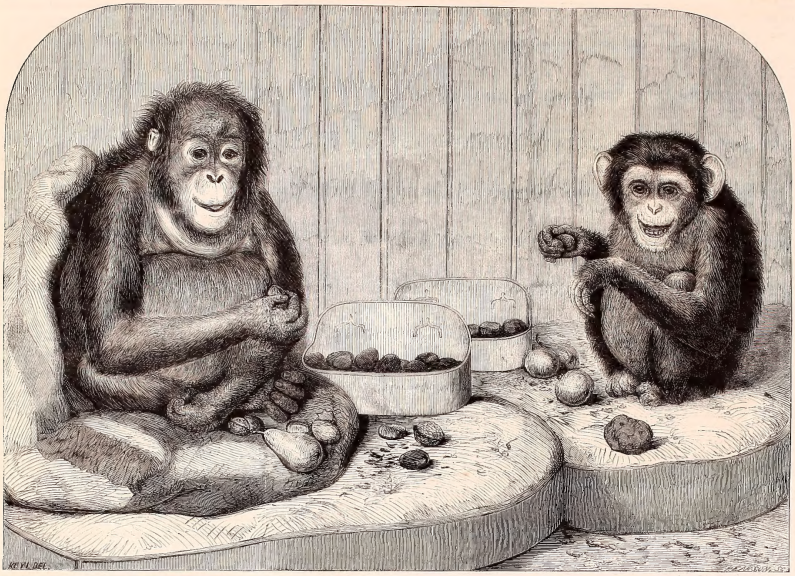
The King of Denmark, accompanied by the Crown Prince and the Minister of the Interior, is paying a visit to Jutland.

On the receipt of the news of the treaty of peace being ratified, Prince Frederick Charles of Prussia issued an address to his troops at Helsingör, in which he said, "Comrades of the allied army! Peace has been concluded and the second Danish war is terminated. A glorious page of history is written. The campaign of 1864 will remain memorable both for you and for posterity."

On Sunday evening Prince Frederick Charles summoned the officers of his staff and instructed them to hold themselves in readiness to carry out at a moment's notice the orders for the departure of the Prussian troops from the duchies. Prince Frederick and Count Wallis, of the Austrian staff, were present.

The Hanoverian troops are to be immediately withdrawn from Holstein, a very summary demand for their removal having been sent by the Prussian Cabinet to Hanover and Dresden. According to the account, this demand is supported by Austria; but whether other information it seems to be in direct opposition to the policy of Vienna, which supports the Diet in its claim to decide in the first place the question of succession.

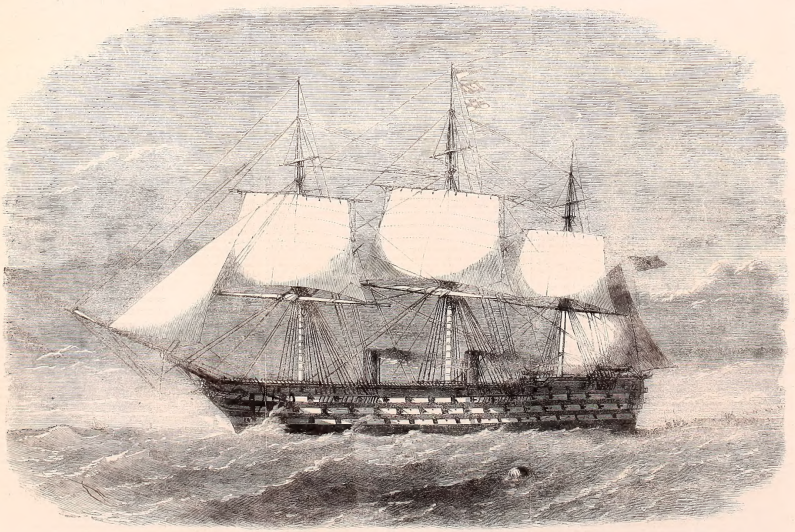
The first detachment of Austrian troops from the duchies has passed through Berlin on its way home. General von Gablenz and Prince Frederick Carl were greeted on the platform of the station on arrival by the King and many of the Princes of the Royal family.



RUSSIA.

Sir Andrew Buchanan, the new British Ambassador to this Court, has arrived at the capital.

The Russian navy has lost one of its most illustrious veterans, Vice-Admiral Romanoff, who died a few days ago. The Admiral's service dates from the year 1813.



A despatch from St. Petersburg gives some further particulars of the Imperial decree with confiscates the convent houses in Poland. It is ordered that all Roman Catholic monasteries and convents having less than eight members, and also those whose participation in the late insurrection was notorious or has since been proved, are to be immediately closed. The inmates of the convents may enter other religious establishments, or will be allowed to go abroad at the public expense. The religious establishments which are not suppressed by this decree are forbidden to maintain relations with either the Provincial or Generals of their orders. The confiscated property of the monasteries and convents will be exclusively devoted to ecclesiastical, educational, and charitable purposes. In pursuance of this decree, seventy-one monasteries and four convents had been closed on account of not possessing the requisite number of inmates, and thirty-nine other religious houses on account of participation in the Polish insurrection.

The Berliner Gazette states that General Berg, the Commander-in-Chief in Poland, has received instructions to forward shortly a report upon the general situation of the kingdom of Poland, and to state whether there is any possibility of provisionally raising the state of siege in certain districts, and in Warsaw in particular, to enable the address to be signed requesting the complete incorporation of the kingdom of Poland with the Russian empire."

THE IMPERIAL MERCANTILE CREDIT ASSOCIATION (LIMITED) are prepared to receive Subscriptions for the above Instrument of Certificates of Debenture, of which £1,200,000 have been already applied for.
The total funded debt over the whole system of the Atlantic and Great Western Railway is £8,000,000, of which £3,000,000 is represented by Shares, and £5,000,000 by Debentures, the line has been constructed with the most substantial engineering skill, and the most profitable results have been for more than realised—the railway, although only partially developed, exhibiting returns of traffic not surpassed even in such busy, without exaggeration, an disagreed unsurpassed.
The Atlantic and Great West was projected it was found necessary to obtain powers for its construction from each State through which it would pass. This compelled independent organisations and separate financial arrangements, the inconvenience attending which has become so manifest, that it is determined to consolidate the whole line under one administration. Pending the completion of legislative enactment, it has been resolved to issue Certificates of Debenture, representing the Bonds of the Company, to the extent of £5,000,000 sterling, which issue is guaranteed by the Consolidated Bank, and the principal secured by a deposit with the trustees of bonds and shares are coming, at most exchange, to £5,500,000.
The bonds and shares so deposited will be kept at the Bank of England, in the names of the Trustees, and the Certificates of Debenture to be tendered by them may be inspected at the office of Messrs. Freshfields and Co., Cornhill.
The Certificates of Debenture are in sums of £100, £500, and £1000 each; with Coupons attached for interest at 6 per cent. per annum, payable half-yearly, on the 15th of November. The whole term will be guaranteed by the Consolidated Bank, with whom securities have been deposited.
The price of issue is fixed at 97, and the instalments are payable as follow :—

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON: SATURDAY, DECEMBER 3, 1864.

In the fatality which attended the attempt of the proprietor of an English journal to use that organ in an unworthy manner there is something which deserves especial attention. We should not have dwelt long upon the mere failure of a newspaper, or upon the curious and ludicrous circumstances of a trial at law; but the circumstances connected with the demise of the Morning Chronicle and with Serjeant Glover's endeavour to obtain a certain remuneration for the work performed by that paper when in a moribund state, are certainly worth notice, because they illustrate, we rejoice to say, the healthy condition of the public mind in regard to the British press.

At no very distant date the Chronicle was a first-rate paper. It was well edited, and well served by as choice a staff of officers as could be got together. Its leading articles were brilliant; its Parliamentary reporting was of the highest class; its critical matter was remarkably smart; and the collection, at great cost, by acute correspondents, not only of foreign news, but of information as to the feelings of the influential classes all over the civilised world, gave a special value to the journal. It passed into other hands than those which had so ably conducted it, and ere long a new character was given to it. The newspaper became the avowed organ and advocate of French Imperialism, and it was understood that its services to the Emperor's Government were not unrewarded. Brief time was necessary for this to be generally known, and then, neither the long and admirable character previously borne by the journal nor the fidelity with which the public clings to an old favourite could avail it. The fine old paper came to unpitied grief, and it died.

We have no desire to go into details further than is absolutely necessary. The fact that Mr. Serjeant Glover required payment, in some form, for the publication of articles in favour of Imperialism, has been put on record by himself, inasmuch as he brought an action against M. De Persigny for such payment. There was a miserable muddle at the trial, and an imperfect letter was supplied as part of the instructions to the plaintiff's counsel. The plaintiff deported himself in a manner which drew down the stern rebuke of the Judge; but we do not wish to enter into the personal part of the affair. It is enough that it has been placed beyond dispute that certain columns in a leading London newspaper, instead of being, like other leading articles, the expression of opinion, were composed in order to their being paid for in some way, not by the public in the faith that it was purchasing an honest argument, but by those whose interests the writing in question was designed to promote. We do not know, and do not want to know, the real nature of the arrangement, or whether money was paid and more money promised, or whether a certain "concession" was the price of the Chronicle's support of the Empire. The two leading facts are that some such negotiation was believed to have been effected, and that Englishmen, therefore, flung the paper aside.

It is, we repeat, a proof of the healthy state of the British mind in regard to the press. The fate of the old Chronicle is honourable to the people of this country. It is a sign that the relations between writer and reader are understood aright, and that any attempt on the part of the former to violate the prescriptive confidence of the latter will be punished in the one only but terrible way open to the public. Long may it be so! While it is so the freedom of the people, the rights of individuals, and the security of Governments are in no danger. While the press is honest and faithful, it is as when a fresh and healthy breeze is constantly passing through the haunts of men; when the press is corrupt, stagnant air and the most pestilential conditions of political and social existence. We talk no cant; we assume for the press no abstract virtue; nor do we claim credit to the journalist for being actuated by higher principles than guide every honest professional man. Journalism is business, and is managed on business principles, and only fanatics can be expected that they carry on a newspaper with other views. But true business means true honesty; and we rejoice to say that very rare indeed—so rare that the circumstance is matter of indignant comment all over the kingdom—is an instance when a newspaper departs from the course of honour. To say that writers are often hasty, and sometimes unjust, is merely to say that newspapers are not conducted by the impeccable beings with whom Mr. Disraeli has just announced his intention to take part. But conscientious advocacy, an abstinence from wilful misrepresentation, and a readiness to make atonement for error, are the ordinary attributes of English journalism; and amid the fiercest strife of party, when parties exist, though tones may be angrier and invectives more unhesitating than at other times, the British press is never betrayed into scandal or falsehood. Therefore, the Englishman of any party looks to the press of all parties as the great protector of the Right.

Happily our own lines have fallen in pleasant places, and it is not often our duty to mingle in angry battle. Therefore we are the more bound to bear testimony in behalf of those whose work is more rapid, and whose temptations to injustice are greater. On the great broad questions of home and foreign policy there is not now much difference when men who are really of sense discuss them. But differences may arise, and probably will do so, before very long, for a party in this country avows its intention of agitating for a reconstruction of the machinery by which popular opinion is ascertained; and foreign affairs, in the Old World and the New, are by no means in a state which promises that we shall long be able to maintain a position of neutrality. Let the storm break where or when it will, the English press will be found doing its duty. Not the least strange circumstance connected with the trial of which we have briefly spoken is found in the belief—if it existed in the minds of Frenchmen who must know England well that the services of a subsidised press could be of avail towards the creation of a public opinion here. The mere fact that the promoters of the best object conceivable have established a paper to promote it, although there is no object in taking such means to a legitimate end, injures the cause far more than the organ can serve it. The "retained" newspaper, hired to maintain certain opinions, is a deadly enemy to its employers. But this is the affair of those who are foolish or ignorant enough not to understand English politics. Sufficient is the duty to notice to others far more than in our own interest, that the fate of the Morning Chronicle illustrates at once the honour of the British press and the confidence reposed in it by the British people.

The inquiry at Leith into the wreck of the steamer Hellibart, on Pallieth during a fog on the night of the 1st ult., has ended in a verdict finding that the vessel was lost through the default of the captain (Macdonald) in attempting to run through a narrow channel at a time when, in consequence of the thick weather, the landmarks were not visible. Captain Macdonald's certificate was suspended for six months.

CONSECRATION OF ALL SAINTS' CHURCH, WINDSOR.

On Monday week, the twenty-fourth birthday of the Crown Princess of Prussia, the new church at Windsor, of which she laid the foundation-stone on the 21st of November, last year, was consecrated for Divine service; and though her Royal Highness could not herself be present on this occasion, her sister-in-law, the Princess of Wales, and her sister Princess Helena, attended the interesting ceremony. The town of Windsor was decorated with flags and banners, as usual on a Royal birthday. The church, an adaptation of the Gothic, has been erected as a chapel of ease to the parish church of New Windsor, and has been designed with a view to future enlargement, but at present it contains sittings for about 600 adults. It consists of a nave and south aisle, chancel, and organ chamber, with temporary vestry underneath, separated from the chancel by an elegantly-painted wooden screen. The building is of brick, with Bath stone dressings. Its site is on the Lammas, a portion of the Crown lands, on the south-west side of the town, near the Frances-road. Close to the west door of the church one of the Royal tents had been erected for the assembling and robing of the numerous clergy. The two Princesses arrived from the castle accompanied by the Very Rev. Gerald Wellesley, Dean of Windsor, the Countess of Macclesfield, Lady Caroline Barrington, Lord Charles Fitzroy, and Lord Methuen. They were received by the Bishop of Oxford, and the Rev. H. J. Ellison, Rev. J. Simpson, Rev. T. Rooke, and Rev. S. J. Stone, the parochial clergy of Windsor. Their Royal Highnesses and suite, having entered the church, took their seats in front of the congregation and to the right of the choir. The Mayor of Windsor, with the Town Clerk and Corporation, occupied seats behind those of the Royal visitors. Colonel R. Vyse and Mr. Vansittart, the borough members, and a host of the residents of the castle and neighbourhood, were seated in front of the choir, while the body of the church was filled to overflowing with a large and respectable congregation. The ceremony was commenced by the Rev. H. J. Ellison, Vicar of Windsor, receiving the Bishop at the west door. His Lordship was followed by his chaplain and nearly fifty clergymen of the diocese, who walked in procession to the altar, reposing the 24th psalm. The Bishop of Oxford, the Rev. Austin Leigh, Vicar of Bray, and the Rev. Mr. Wilder, sat within the communion-rail; the rest of the clergy took their seats in the stalls of the choir. During the service the Bishop of British Columbia arrived, and was escorted to the altar by the Vicar of Windsor. The sermon was preached by the Bishop of Oxford, who selected for his text the words, "And for all there were so many, yet was not the net broken," being a portion of the 11th verse of the 21st chapter of the Gospel of St. John. From this text the Right Rev. Prelate delivered a highly impressive discourse, in which he alluded to the increased population of Windsor, which had necessitated an extension of church accommodation, and congratulated those engaged in this work upon the support afforded by the presence of the Royal Princesses. His Lordship concluded with the hope that those present would contribute towards the liquidation of the debt on the building, about £200. After the usual prayers the sentence of consecration was then read by the Chancellor and signed by the Bishop. On the conclusion of the ceremony the Princesses retired from the church and drove back to the castle. Many of the congregation remained to receive the communion. The offertory amounted to £101 9s. 6d. In the afternoon a luncheon, given by the building committee of the church was partaken of by the Bishop of Oxford, the clergy, the Mayor and Corporation, the borough members, and a large number of the residents of the town and district. About 300 persons sat down. The graces, both before and after luncheon, were said by the Bishop of Oxford. Viscount Kirkcaldie acted as chairman. In the evening, at half-past six o'clock, there was a service, at which the Bishop of Columbia preached to a large congregation.

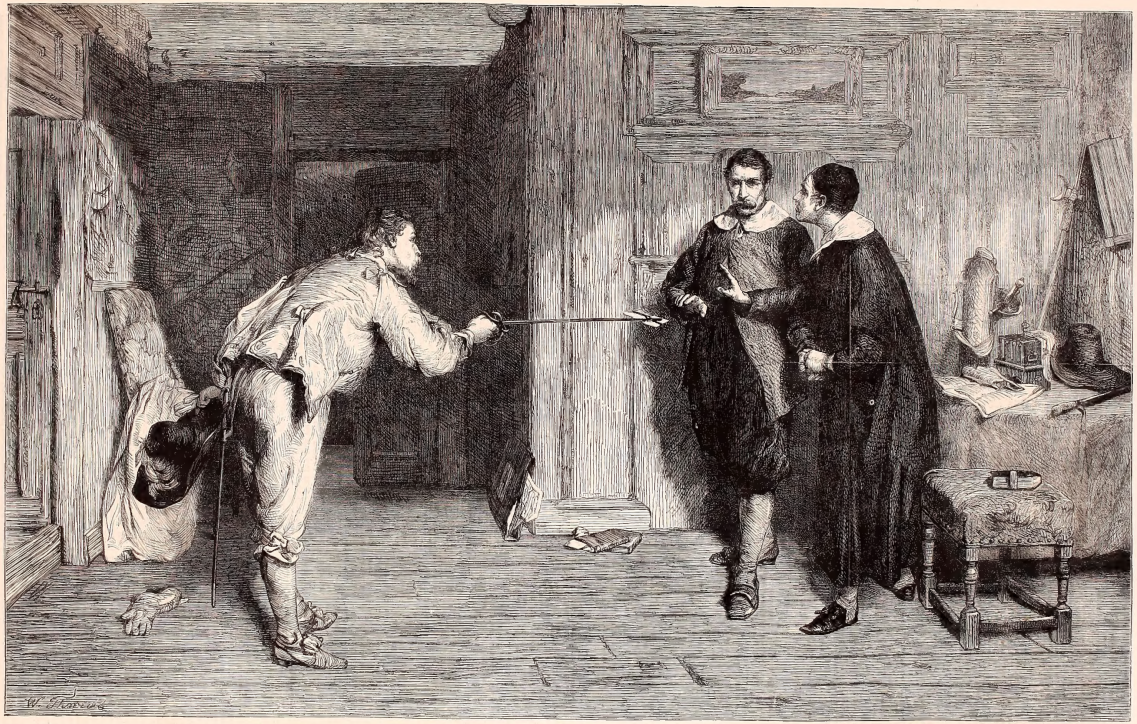
THE OLD MILL ON WIMBLEDON-COMMON.



The destruction of a familiar landmark in one of the most noted places of the neighbourhood of London must not be allowed to pass without such a record of its aspect as the sketch we have this week engraved. The old windmill on Wimbledon-common has outlived several generations, and has always been recognised with some interest as one of the most picturesque and characteristic features of a rustic piece of scenery at no great distance from the metropolis. During the last four or five years the summer meetings of the National Rifle Association have drawn increasing multitudes of visitors to the ground which is overlooked by this conspicuous structure, and it has become known, probably, to hundreds of thousands who might otherwise never have resorted to the spot—like the still more famous windmill on the heights of Düppel, which figures historically among the best-remembered circumstances of the late Schleswig-Holstein War. There are, moreover, so few windmills in the country around London, that the disappearance of this specimen of the quaint mechanical contrivance, which steam will, doubtless, sooner or later supersede, not only here but everywhere else, must naturally be remarked.

"THE CHALLENGE": A PURITAN'S STRUGGLE BETWEEN HONOUR AND CONSCIENCE."

In our recent review of the Winter Exhibition at the French Gallery, Pall-mall, we said that the picture which, of all the collection, would afford most surprise, as well to artists as unprofessional visitors, was the one now engraved. It is not merely that Mr. W. G. Orchardson was, before the exhibition of this picture, comparatively little known, seeing that he was only remembered by two contributions to the Royal Academy—a large portrait group and a picture of a party of laughing lassies returning from milking—both works of great promise rather than of complete achievement; but it is that this picture of "The Challenge" evinces, besides rare skill and spirit in telling a story, a maturity of style and an unhesitating dexterity of handling (reminding us of John Gilbert's) with which few would credit the artist who remember his former works, notwithstanding their very considerable and undeniable merits; and which unsuspected powers are the more surprising, as they must have been developed with very unusual rapidity.

As regards the treatment of the difficult subject selected, and the realisation of the highly dramatic situation, the reader who has not seen the picture will, through the medium of our Engraving, have an opportunity of judging to some extent of the justice of remarks already made. We will therefore, only repeat that the characters represented seem to us capitally contrasted. The Cavalier, though we can see less than the profile of his face (which, by-the-way, is admirably drawn and foreshortened), looks—with his determined, devil-may-care expression; his long love-locks; his gay, canary-coloured satin doublet and breeches and plumed hat—like your fine gentleman of the Rochester school, who, forsooth, would run through a man's cr break a woman's heart with the same equanimity. He has found or made some cause for special quarrel with this Puritan, and, as we are led to infer, has sought him out at his own unostentatious home. The glove on the floor is not, be sure, without significance; and now the Cavalier, with a most irritating affectation of extreme courtesy towards the man he would provoke to a deadly encounter, doffs his hat and gives his lowest bow as he presents the letter containing the challenge, held forth at the point of his rapier—implying, of course, that the Puritan is only fit to be treated with at the point of the sword. The challenged man is in every way a contrast to the polished bully confronting him. His close-cropped head, plain though manly features, and sombre, formal, ascetic garb, might be less welcome, and would certainly be less ornamental, in a lady's boudoir; but we cannot refrain from repeating—what occurred to us in first noticing the picture—that very likely he would also prove, in another sense, an ugly customer. To our mind, the Puritan looks like a stanch Cromwellian veteran, and we have little doubt that he knows well how to use that rapier of his lessing against the chair-back. You see at once that anger is the uppermost feeling, and may be that his first impulse is to clutch at and accept the cartel. But then he has the grave conscientious objections against the accursed duello; he considers it a crime for which he will be held to account; he deems it an eminently characteristic of the peaches Cavalier; and Conscience to him is, at least, what Honour is to the man who has never known sin. What is a brave man to do in such a situation? Is he to commit, or be tempted to commit, a mortal sin, and give the lie to his life, or is he, while conscious of his own courage, to submit to that most dreadful stigma of "coward"? The latter alternative is so terrible to some natures of genuine heroic stamp, that it has to be a much more terrible to a soldier by profession, that to induce him to accept it the Puritan must pay well feel the necessity of adding the entreaties of a friend to the arguments suggested by that specific cause. The agonising "struggle" of conflicting feelings in the mind of the Puritan is, of course, beyond a painter's power of realisation; yet Mr. Orchardson has done much to suggest it. Notwithstanding Sir Joshua Reynolds's advice never to attempt to represent mixed emotions—anger, doubt, and a not ignoble apprehensiveness seem plainly written in that lowering and generally, we should say, powerful face.

Since these remarks were written we have learnt with much satisfaction that Mr. Orchardson's work has obtained the prize of £100 offered by Mr. Wills for the best figure picture.

MUSIC.

Mr. Hatton's new opera, "Rose; or, Love's Ransom," produced at Covent Garden on Saturday last, has merit enough to deserve success on both evenings on which it has been given. The music belongs to the music, the faults to the libretto; and, as the excellence of the music is more than sufficient to make up for the weakness of the drama, it may be hoped that the composer will not be driven to despair by the whole, favourable. The piece is founded on, and, indeed, is a mere version of, Halévy's pretty opera, "Le Val d'Andorre," which was very popular at Paris some fifteen years since. But the English adapter has made alterations on the original which are far from improvements. In the first place, the story has been so blundered as to be made confused and almost unintelligible. The scene is laid in a French or Swiss village, where, among other things, Rose, a country girl, and the hero and heroine of the tale. Rose is the betrothed of the village inn, kept by Thevenet, a young person who loves the handsome hostess; and he, moreover, is another inamorata in the person of Georgette, a rustic coquette, who is regarded as the belle of the village. Rose, however, as she is in station, is the ward of an old goatherd (Jacques), who loves her as his child and has gathered together a considerable sum for her marriage portion. There is a military conscription; and the village must furnish a recruit, and the lot falls on Stephen, who, saddened by his misfortune, sees no means of extricating himself in the mountains. His flight is immediately discovered, and the recruiting officer proclaims him a deserter, unless he shall, instantly, he shall be pursued and shot. In this extremity Rose bethinks her of a sum of 3000*l.* belonging to her mistress committed to her keeping. This money she gives to Stephen to enable him to procure his discharge, meaning to replace it by her own dowry in the hands of her guardian. The sergeant accepts the money, and Stephen's flight has returned as foolishly as he had run away, is discharged. But Thevenet, who has discovered the abstraction of the money, and shame officers of justice arrive to arrest her as a thief; but at this moment, when her position has reached its climax, Jacques arrives, announcing that the missing sum is found. The clouds disappear in an instant, Thevenet gets back her money, and there is no longer any obstacle to the happiness of the lovers, who so unite in the denouement of the piece. Now, not to speak of the very French morality of the conduct of Rose has really committed a theft, though for her lover's sake—the incidents are in various respects unaccountable. We neither know how old Jacques became rich, nor whose thousand francs, nor how he as suddenly recovered them; and yet it is on these two circumstances that the intelligibleness of the story depends. The subject, moreover, is in many respects in interest weakened by the introduction of superfluous personages. Of these the rustic Georgette, as one, and Blanche, the daughter of Jacques, as another. Neither of them has any influence on the progress of the story, and they serve only to put a piece of padding at any rate. But the music goes far to reconcile us to the dramatic faults of this opera. Mr. Hatton holds a high place among our English musicians of the time, and this work is worthy of his reputation. His experience and skill in writing for the voice are apparent in every scene. In the airs, concerted pieces, and choruses, the melody is never lost or harassed by these unvocal phrases or harsh instrumental intervals so prevalent in music of the modern German school. Mr. Hatton has diligently studied and formed his style upon the most classical models—the works of the great masters of a past age. With the music of Mozart, Beethoven he is especially conversant, and the influence of his studies are apparent, not only in the clearness, expression, and vocal character of his melody, but in the purity and elegance of his instrumentation. He is constrained, like all our English opera composers, to sacrifice to the shop by introducing the usual quantity of ballads (without any for the benefit of the singers); but this is a necessity he cannot help, and we must regard it as his misfortune rather than his fault. Some of the airs, however, are of a very beautiful but quite appropriate, such as Rose's "Gentle flower, can't thou tell," and "Oh, sound sleep" (which are not only delightful on the stage but will be equally so in the concert-hall or the drawing-room. But it is in the concerted music that Mr. Hatton's strength chiefly lies. His quartets, and choruses are remarkably melodious; but the magnificent finale to the second act, so masterly in construction, so rich in harmony, and so full of dramatic effect, is the crowning of the name of Mozart himself. The opera is excellently performed. Mdme. Lemaire-Sherrington is a most charming Rose, equally admirable for her pretty acting and her brilliant and beautiful singing. Mrs. Poole, a genuine English singer, is a very pleasing representative of Thevenet's wife. Weiss, although she cannot sing a ballad at all or a stupid a part as that of Georgette, does justice to the music. Mr. Byron, in the character of Stephen, was remarkable for vigour and effect, and the same thing may justly be said of Mr. Weiss in the character of the old goatherd. The remaining characters are well sustained, by Mr. H. Corri and Mr. Aynsley Cook. The chorus and orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Alfred Mellon, display their wonted excellence, and the scenery, decorations, costumes, and dances—everything belonging to the spectacle—are appropriate and in excellent taste. This entertainment was repeated on Monday evening—Benedict's operetta, in one act, "The Bride of Song," which is to precede the performance of Hatton's opera: too much for one night.

The Sacred Harmonic Society began their season (the thirty-first) with a magnificent performance of Mendelssohn's "St. Paul" at Exeter Hall on Friday evening, the 25th of November. The solo performers were Mdme. Rudersdorff, Miss Julia Elton, Mr. Montem Smith (in the room of Mr. Sims Reeves, who was prevented by illness from singing), Mr. Weiss, and Mr. C. Henry. The solos, as well as the choruses, were admirably sung, and the audience (the convenient restriction in that respect being no longer regarded) were enthusiastic in their applause.

The Hullah Choral Society had a concert on Wednesday evening, Nov. 23, at the Music Hall, in Store-street. It was in two parts—the first sacred, the second secular. In the first part Handel's air, "Farewell, ye limpid springs," and Mendelssohn's air from "St. Paul," "Jerusalem, Jerusalem!" were beautifully sung by Miss Banks. The latter was encored. The fine chorus from the same oratorio, "Happy and blessed are they," was finely sung by the choir. The secular selection included airs and part-songs of Bishop, Weber, Rossini, and Hatton. A brilliant fantasia on the piano was played by Miss Fanny Howell, and encored with general applause. The clever young lady performed the functions of the orchestra during the whole evening, including the songs, in most able accompaniment. The whole concert did the society much honour.

We learn that Mdlles. Emilie and Constance Georgi—the first contralto, the second soprano—have engaged at the Liceo Italian Opera House, Barcelona, for the winter season.

THE THEATRES.

The "Dames du Cabaret" of Messrs. Adolphe D'Ennery and Dumanoir was produced on Wednesday at the New Adelphi, Mr. Webster having got from the bargain two pieces for the exclusive copyright, and re-entitled it "The Workmen of Paris, or the Victims of the Wine-shop." It is produced as neat as possible after the original, and the curtain is drawn up on each tableau, according to Parisian custom. Of these tableaux there are nine, though the drama itself consists only of five acts. The first and concluding one scene in which the workmen are revelling in a wine-shop of Paris. They are portrayed as sacrificing all their happiness for wine, particularly Dunbury, an engineer (Mr. Phillips), whose wife and daughter (Mrs. Stirling and Miss Woolgar) follow him to the fatal cabaret, and at last induce him to go home. But it is not the drunkard alone who indulge in drink; the vice has its aristocratic supporters; and in the second act we are introduced to "the Bachelor's Party at the Café Bignon," where we meet with Albert Count de Marsac (Mr. Belmore), Ion and Van Gratz (Mr. Webster), a scientist Dutch merchant, who believes in nothing but gold, and, by his own confession, has been guilty of a murder. On the character of this infidel to all goodness, and, indeed, to humanity, the eighty pages, and, after all, overleaping misfortunes on all who surround him, he is made to repent his error and finally to blow out his brains in a boat. Van Gratz has a grandchild, Josepha (Miss Henrietta Simms), who is affianced to Albert de Marsac, the latter has and a love passage with Dunbury's daughter, Blanche (Miss Woolgar), which, of course, ends happily after a journey his unfortunate victim. Meanwhile all is going wrong at the house of Dunbury, where the enormous expenses of the family to separate from him. He becomes enraged, and, meeting with them at the grand fondey of Neveu Necaille, quarrels, and hurls his son against one of the wheels in the machine, by which he is severely injured. Blanche, finding that Albert's love for her has deprived himself and his mother of the money of the latter, desperately leaves the conservatory resigns his hand, and then determines on suicide. She casts herself into the Seine, and is rescued by a man whom Van Gratz had appointed to assassinate her. After a long and touching scene, whether she is followed by Van Gratz and his daughter, as well as by Count Albert de Marsac, the former confesses to the loss of her lover, and wounds herself to death with a poisoned lancet, which Van Gratz had given to Josepha for the latter's convenience. The old, selfish infidel finds himself defeated both practically and speculatively, both in his interests and his theory, and on his knees renounces his scepticism. The scenery of the piece is very fine, and the actors and actresses, is magnificent. The characters all are ably supported, and the strong interest excited by the action was shown by the general applause with which it was greeted. The performance is an undoubted success.

Another drama ("D'er Sonnenwendhof") by Dr. Mosenthal, the author of "Deborah," has been placed on the English boards, in an almost literal translation, at the Lyceum, successfully effected by Mr. J. V. Bridgman. It is entitled "Sunny Valley Farm," and has been furnished the libretto of Mr. Macfarren's opera, "Helvellyn." It is needless, therefore, to say that the plot is simple, and the underlying servant-girl, who is cleverly represented by Mdlle. Beatrice at the Wyndham), is the only character deserving of notice. The way she was yet powerful, and related the destruction of the foundry with a strange mixture of regret and revenge. The manner in which she replied the violent approaches of a libertine was also very good. The determination to employ the hatchet with which she was armed, and which, in its calmness, was the means of her escape, was admirably and been accompanied by the usual vehemence of stage action. The events, the close of "Sunny Valley Farm" are somewhat like Styria, and Messrs. Conor and Morris have painted some illustrative scenes with the greatest effect. The play is throughout well acted; Mr. Howe with no shrinking from the thorough-paced villain of the piece, and whose theatrical is so conspicuous. Mrs. E. Fitzwilliam makes up peculiarly for the character of a servant-girl, and is very much liked. The audience were not demonstrative in their applause until the end, when Miss Bateman was called on with a vigour and unanimity which showed the impression she had made.

The legitimate drama continues successful at the Standard. The play of "Jane Eyre" has again been dealt thoroughly with the audience, who show such a keen perception of the poetry, pathos, and intelligence of Miss Edith Heraud's setting, that they have called her before the curtain repeatedly during the evening. The effectiveness of this impersonation depends greatly on her peculiar conception of the character, and on the manner in which she delivers her lines. The usual mode has been to attempt a classical and statuesque representation; but in the Greek maiden Miss Heraud detects a natural coldness, and in her relations with Mr. Rochester a half-hysterical sensitive, which tells with prodigious effect. The more the audience see of this performance the more they appreciate the only a perfect elocutionist can command. Mr. Glenny, as Ingomar, and Mr. Lyall, as Mr. Brocklehurst, are very good, and who, when he shall have become more accustomed to the London stage, will improve in what may be denominated the cultivate of the art. At present he is too much inclined to exaggerate, and sometimes his exercise in style which is so needful to the attainment of an entirely correct conception of his part. If he will study moderation and application, Mr. Glenny must, by a renewed study and sedulous practice of our plays, be one of the best leading tenors without which the highest excellence may not be realised. He powers are undoubted, and it rests with himself to exhibit them to the best advantage.

The pantomime at the Surrey is entitled "Don Giovanni," and is written by Mr. J. C. Brennan. There is a sort of refinement in punning which Mr. Brennan does not affect; but he never indulges in a joke that is not in some little regard to elegance. His dances and jarodies are frequent, and show a thorough acquaintance with the subjects of which they treat, while perpetually stimulate the audience by sudden and extreme contrasts. The company at this house includes many good burlesque performers. Mr. Alfred Harrison, Miss Marie Wilton, and Miss Fanny Josephs especially deserving of recognition. The Elvira of Mr. W. Elleton was a powerful piece of burlesque acting, and Mr. Archer, there is no new extravagance, which, at this season of the year, is likely to serve the purpose of a pantomime management.

At the Royal Gallery of Illustration, Mr. and Mrs. German Reed and Mr. John Parry closed last Saturday their Opera di Camera Entertainment; but will open on Monday with a new series of illustrations, consisting of "The Rival Coachmen," "The Bard and his Bantlings," and "A descriptive song," "The Seaside; or, Mrs. Rosebud out of Town." Novelties are promised throughout.

The amateur action of the Royal Artillery Theatrical Club, at Woolwich, has been transferred to their own theatre at the barracks, the drama of "Payable on Demand" and the farce of "Urgent Private Affairs" with much success.

On Monday a dinner was given by Mr. R. N. Phillips, F.S.A., chairman of one of the Corporation committees. It was given at the Freemasons' Tavern to a distinguished company to meet the Lord Mayor, the Sheriffs, and members for the city of London. The guests numbered about 150.

The plans and sections for new railways and extensions deposited with the Board of Trade up to eight o'clock on Wednesday night, the last hour allowed for such deposit by the standing orders of Parliament, amounted to 347, being an increase of forty-one on those of last year.

THE COURT.

The Queen, with the junior members of the Royal family, continues at Windsor Castle, the enjoyment of good health.

On Thursday week her Majesty, accompanied by Princess Beatrice, walked and drove in the castle grounds. Princess Helena rode in the riding-school. Princess Louisa and Prince Leopold, attended by Mdlle. Sorelle and Mr. Boff, drove out. The Prussian Ambassador and Countess Bernstorff arrived at the castle, and had the honour of dining with her Majesty.

Yesterday week the Queen, accompanied by Princess Helena, and attended by the Countess of Caledon, the Hon. Mrs. Bruce, Colonel the Hon. C. B. Phipps, Lord Charles Fitzroy, and Colonel the Hon. A. Buchanan, left London and visited the new barracks at Chelsea. Her Majesty left the Windsor station of the Great Western Railway in eleven vehicles. The Queen travelled by special train to Paddington, and drove thence to the barracks. Her Majesty received the troops by Quartermaster-General Sir Richard Airey, Lord Frederick Paulet, commanding the Household Cavalry, Colonel Lambert (Grenadier Guards), Colonel H. Ponsonby, and Major Stephenson, of the Scots Fusilier Guards. The battalion of Grenadiers was drawn up in line, with their colours, but without their band. The Queen was received with a Royal salute, and as the men were formed in line her Majesty's carriage passed slowly along the front of the line. The Queen visited the principal departments of the building and inspected the various arrangements. During the visit her Majesty entered a large dining-room in which the Scots Fusilier Guards were partaking of dinner. The Queen and Princess Helena walked around the room, and appeared highly pleased with the appearance of the men. Her Majesty also proceeded to the ground which has been selected as the site of a chapel where occasional performances will be given for the amusement of the troops. Upon the departure of the Queen the Grenadiers again marched. Her Majesty was loudly cheered by a large concourse of people. The route was subsequently taken by Alexandra-street, and honoured Lady Churchill with a visit, and thence proceeded to the Paddington terminus, returning by special train to Windsor, whither her Majesty arrived at forty-five minutes past one.

On Saturday last the Queen, accompanied by Princess Beatrice, walked and drove in the castle grounds. Princess Helena rode in the riding-school. Princess Louisa and Prince Leopold, attended by Lady Florence Seymour and Mr. Boff, drove out. Princess Helena, attended by Lady Caroline Barrington, the Hon. Eleanor Stanley, and Lord Charles Fitzroy, went to London in the evening and honoured the performance at the Princess's Theatre with her presence, returning to the castle at night. Sir Charles Wood arrived at the castle.

On Sunday the Queen, Princess Helena, Princess Beatrice, and Prince Leopold attended Divine service in the private chapel of the castle. The Rev. A. Westminster officiated.

On Monday the Queen, accompanied by Princess Helena, went to Ham and visited the Duke and Duchess de Chartres. Her Majesty travelled by special train to South-Western Railway to the Kingston station, and drove thence to Ham, returning to Windsor by the same route at six o'clock.

On Tuesday the Queen, accompanied by Princess Helena, walked and drove in the grounds of the castle. In the evening, Princess Helena and Princess Louisa honoured the Princess's Theatre with the Hon. Mrs. Wellesley, Captain Sir W. Hoste, and Mr. Boff, went to the theatre and honoured the performance at the Princess's Theatre with their presence. Their Royal Highnesses returned to Windsor Castle at twelve o'clock. The Maharajah Dhuleep Singh and the Maharanee visited her Majesty at Windsor.

On Wednesday the Queen held a Council, which was attended by Earl Granville, Lord President, Viscount Palmerston, and the Right Hon. Sir George Grey. Earl Russell had an audience of her Majesty, and was presented Mr. Francis Mundy. Earl Granville also had an audience of the Queen. Mr. Thomas Henry, chief constable at Bow-street, was presented to her Majesty and received the honour of knighthood. Lord Alfred Paget and Captain Sir Thomas Biddulph are the Lord and Groom in Waiting. Mr. Arthur Helps, the Clerk of the Council, was in attendance. Subsequently the Council was attended by Princess Helena and Princess Louisa, walked and drove in the grounds.

The Queen was graciously pleased to be sponsor to the infant son and heir of Lord and Lady Churchill. Viscountess Jocelyn represented her Majesty at the christening. The infant was named Albert Francis Charles, to whom the Queen sends a handsome present.

The Countess of Caledon succeeds the Countess of Caledon as Lady in Waiting to her Majesty.

The Hon. Mrs. Cathcart and the Hon. Florence Seymour have succeeded the Hon. Caroline Dundas and the Hon. Flora Macdonald as Maids of Honour to the Queen.

THE PRINCE AND PRINCESS OF WALES.

The Prince and Princess of Wales and Prince Alfred Victor arrived at Sandringham House on Thursday week.

The Prince and Princess have had shooting excursions upon his estates. The Princess takes frequent walks and drives in the vicinity of Sandringham.

The Duke of Cambridge arrived at Sandringham House on Wednesday, on a visit to their Royal Highnesses.

During the absence of the Royal Princess, great improvements have been made at Sandringham and in its immediate vicinity.

Their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess d'Aumale and Prince de Conde left town on Saturday last for their residence near Evesham.

Earl and Countess Russell and family have left their residence in Chesham-place for their seat in Hampshire, Pembroke Park.

Viscountess Palmerston gave a small party, last Saturday evening, at her residence in Piccadilly, at which the usual Foreign Ambassadors and Ministers, with about fifty persons of distinction, were present.

The Right Hon. B. Disraeli and Mrs. Disraeli have left Craddock House for Strathfieldsaye, Hants, on a visit to the Duke and Duchess of Wellington.

MARRIAGES IN HIGH LIFE.

The marriage of his Excellency M. de Bille, the representative of Denmark at the Court of St. James's, to Lucie Christine, daughter of the late Sir Frederick Pollock, Bart., was celebrated, on Thursday week, at Mary's Church, Bryanston-square, by the bride's brother, the Rev. Frederick Pollock, assisted by their Excellencies the Danish Minister and Madame Bille, and Mr. Edmund Phipps, Minister of the Danish Church in London.

The marriage of Lord Ossulston, eldest son and heir-apparent of the Earl of Ailesmere, to Captain Frederick William Charteris, R.N., third son of the Earl of Wemyss and March, was celebrated, on Saturday last, at Stanton church, near the mansion of the bride's father, Quiddenham Hall, Norfolk. The marriage of Mr. Edward Stanley Attwollam and Miss Anson, only unmarried daughter of the late General Anson and sister of the Bishop of Bristol, is to take place on Wednesday next.

A matrimonial alliance is about to be formed between the Right Rev. Dr. Ryder, Bishop of Lincoln, and the eldest daughter of Lady King, of Madingley, Cambridgeshire.

The Lord Lieutenant of Ireland was entertained by the Lord Mayor of Dublin at the regular banquet which is given to him at his installation, his Excellency made a long and eloquent speech. He referred to the progress which the country had made, to the electricity which had revived from the depression of several years, arising from the famine and successive bad harvests, and to the magnificent Exhibition which on Friday his Excellency was received with great enthusiasm at the Dublin Society's House and on the inauguration of the International Exhibition of the Industrial Society. Lord and Lady Wodehouse went on Monday to Killarney, on a visit to Lord and Lady Castlerosse. On arrival they were presented with an address of welcome by the High Sheriff.

The Lord Mayor of Dublin delivered a lecture on Monday evening in the centre transept of the exhibition building "On the Manufactures of Ireland." There was a large attendance. Mr. A. B. Rugot occupied the chair. His Lordship reviewed the past history of manufactures in Ireland, attributing their decline mainly to the want of encouragement on the part of the Government, and in some measure to the introduction of machinery. At considerable length he went into statistics, showing the status of manufactures in other countries—particularly alluding to Scotland and Belgium, and concluded by referring to the Industrial Exhibition as a proof of what could be accomplished in that country were a fostering hand held out by Government, such as who afforded elsewhere, and the results of which were so beneficial.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

THE racing season of 1864 closed with a three-furlong's watch, in which Chicot the Jester was beaten. It would seem a just indeed to call Frank Buckle, if he could leave his tomb at Long Orton for a space and find that jockeys, instead of indulging in the time-honoured goose on the Sunday after the Houghton Meeting, had to muzzle and waste up to the 24th of November. Racing statistics threaten to be more elaborate than ever this winter. The very mounts of the jockeys have been calculated, and J. Grimshaw has won 141 times out of 433, so that those who always back him must have done well. The value of the stakes at the four principal Two-day meetings—viz., at the Doncaster, Goodwood, and Epsom—is £64,421; and, as the number of starters, the above is their order of precedence. The sum total of the five great two-year-old stakes of the year is 1850 l. is £115,700; and their value has increased, between those years, from £19,900 to £25,675.

Blair Athol has won £13,293; and Ely, who has worked hard for it, £5416; while Liddington and Zombies make up £3000 each on their account for Mr. Merry. There are nine more sixteen fillies for the Royal sale next year—to wit, five by Orlando; four by Newminster; two each by Beadsman, Vedette, Voltigeur, and Young Melbourne; eight by Gladiator; and one each by Rataplan and Wild Dayrell. Among them are own sisters to Chattanooga and Imaus. Ten out of Mr. Gyll's fifteen are colts. He has been very faithful to "the old horse," who has rewarded him with four colts and two fillies. The Squire of Hastings' nine of his stud at Tattersall's, on Monday, for 730 gs. Ackworth and The Duke were not in the list; and Redcap, 959 gs.; Tinsley, 700 gs.; who is put out of training and goes to Huntingdon, to Castle Donnington; Lady Eglilla, 600 gs.; and Catalogue, 1850 gs. (150 gs. below her reserve price), were all bought in. The sale of the late Captain Becher's effects did not make much, as "seven racing-jackets" only went for a crown. Nineteen stalled for Captain Stephenson, in which the four Derby horses fell and nearly twice as many Engelish.

The interest in cricket for 1865 seems likely to be very much furthered by the breaking up of the old United, or rather Dunsted, Eleven, and the formation of a United and South of England, which at present consists of Willsher, Bennett, Hearne, the two Lillywhites, Lockyer, Mortlock, Jupp, T. Humphrey, Pooley, Cæsar, Sewell (jun.), and Griffith. It thus includes the very pick of the old Players, besides Grundy and Caffyn (in Australia), and has an accession from the All England Eleven in Julius and Caesar. Several matches are already made, and we hope to hear of one being arranged ere long with the All England, in which Carpenter will no doubt be succeeded with his two Cambridge brethren in arms. Efforts have been tending to this for a long time, and the listless, uncomfortable season of '64 was supplying the best incentive of others deeply that the union of the Eleven cause the better.

"Stonehenge" has just published a second edition of his valuable work on the Greyhound, which is illustrated with five fresh portraits—Beacon, Bedalmite, David, Riot, and Chloe.

There was a forty-nine classes at the Birmingham Dog Show, whose entries have risen in six years from ninety to 707. Mr. Beaseley wins the deer-hound prize with "Alder," and, with the exception of that won by the Duke of Beaufort's second-season dog Raglan by Wynnstay Royal (nineteen couple of whose stock are now working in Sir Watkin's pack), the North Warwickshire wins every first fox-hound prize. Mr. Thomas Smith, of Torr Lodge, near Wolverhampton, has a double first with his celebrated pointers Dash and Whitehouse, of Ripley Court, Warwickshire, with small-sized pointers; and Mr. P. Kelloch, of Kirriemuir, Scotland, with English setters and end-tan setters. King Dick was again the king of the bulldogs; and Mr. J. Hinks kept up the Birmingham prestige with his bull-terriers Madman and Empress.

Sir Watkin Wynne's hounds have no had much sport this last week, owing to the summer weather. They have, however, had a good deal in the past month, of an hour to forty-five minutes, with a kill. There has been fair sport with the Belvoir, and some country has been better off to ground in the stone-quarries below Tilton Wood; and Lord Wilton was out for the first time this season with the Pytchley. Foot-coursing has been very unfavourable; but with the Heythrop things have gone remarkably well for the last fortnight. Out of four stone runs we with Bourton on second foot from Newington covers to Wroxton Heath, in the Warwickshire country. The Badminton have been hunting a fox over a good deal of flat-looking country, and had a good brace of scalps on it. The Brocklesley have had some good gallops with Leicestershire foxes, and Nimrod Long-Wellesley and himself caressed the farmers to take a very different interest in the sport to what they have done lately. The Cheshire country is very wet and deep. Sir Richard Sutton has had a racing two minutes, "with no" Hold hard! in it, from Newton Gore to Wrttley," and killed.

The King of Bavaria arrived at Munich on Tuesday.

Tuesday's Gazette stated that the Speaker would issue his warrant in six days thence for the election of a member for the northern division of the Lancashire coast, in the room of the late Mr. R. Gregson.

The body of commercial travellers have presented to the National Life-boat Institution the cost of a life-boat. She is to be stationed at Fleetwood, in Lancashire coast.

Shanghai possesses a rowing-club, a gymnasium, a debating society, a theatre, theatrical corps, a cricket club, and a branch of the Royal Asiatic Society.

The cable of the Victoria extension of the Oregon and Washington territory line of telegraph, which it was intended to lay across the Straat of San Juan de Fuca, has been lost on board the Theiber, off Cape Horn, on her voyage to London.

The steamer Cycle, which left Shanghai port on the 1st of October for Hong Kong, with a cargo of 20,000 dol. on board, was captured and sunk by pirates, aided by Cantonese; and a portion of the crew and the master murdered.

The annual contest for aquatic honours between the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge is thus arranged :—The race is to come off on Saturday, April 1. The Cambridge crew are strong—the Light Blue will only exception (Mr. E. K. Pigott, of Corpus), the Cambridge crew will this year consist of six men.

The memorial of Sir G. C. Lewis, erected at New Radnor, was unveiled on Saturday, in the presence of a large concourse of people. The Chancellor and the Bishop of St. David's delivered addresses, in which they did just homage to the genius and public services of the distinguished statesman and scholar.

The prizes and certificates awarded to the successful candidates in the Oxford Local Examinations, recently held at Bath, were on Thursday week distributed by the Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol, at a public meeting held at the Guildhall in that city. The Mayor of Bath presided, and in opening the proceedings spoke warmly and eloquently in approval of the examinations.

The annual foot-ball matches at Eton College took place on Wednesday. St. Andrew's Day is a conflict between the collegers and the oppidans commenced "at the wall," at twelve o'clock, to last an hour, at which time the players were victorious by three goals. Mr. Lubbock was captain on the collegers' side; and Mr. Lewis on the oppidans' side. The annual cricket contest between the Old Etonians and the present Cambridge took place in the "Cimbrels," beginning at two o'clock, and terminated in the latter having won by the Cambridge eleven by one run. The most scientific and exciting contests that has been witnessed on the grounds of Eton. Mr. Tench, Esq., was captain of the Cambridge, and Mr. Lubbock of the Oxford side.

A meeting of the Lancashire Central Relief Committee was held on Wednesday at the Townhall, Manchester. The High Sheriff (Sir J. Kay-Shuttleworth) presided. The secretary reported that he had been authorised to call a meeting that week, and that the balance in the bank was £80,000. Mr. Furnall read a report, showing that for the present the heaviest period of distress had passed, and that on the 19th ult. there was a decrease of 1048 persons in the receipt of relief in the twenty-seven unions, as compared with the previous fortnight. Mr. Furnall read a letter from Mr. Thornley, private secretary to Mr. Villiers, stating that Mr. Villiers's attention having been more than once directed to a communication made to the Central Relief Committee by the Town Clerk of Manchester relative to the loan authorised under the Public Works Act to the Manchester Corporation, he had caused a statement (which was inclosed) to be perused of the circumstances under which the loan was sanctioned by the Poor-law Board. Numerous grants were then made from the federal and Employment Fund and the general fund.

The latest news from Bermuda is to the 30th of October. At that date the yellow fever had ceased at every point, and merely a few mild, manageable cases existed at one locality—Ireland Islands. The public health was generally good.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

CONSIDERABLE business was revealed in the market for all National Securities, and prices generally, although the fluctuations have been by no means important, have given way to some extent. The adverse state of some of the Continental exchanges, and the unfavourable news from the principal corn-growing districts of India and Egypt, have created rather an uneasy feeling in the Stock Exchange. The demand for Bank-stock continued to be very moderate, and the quotations had to be lower. The Bank of England has published the following return:—

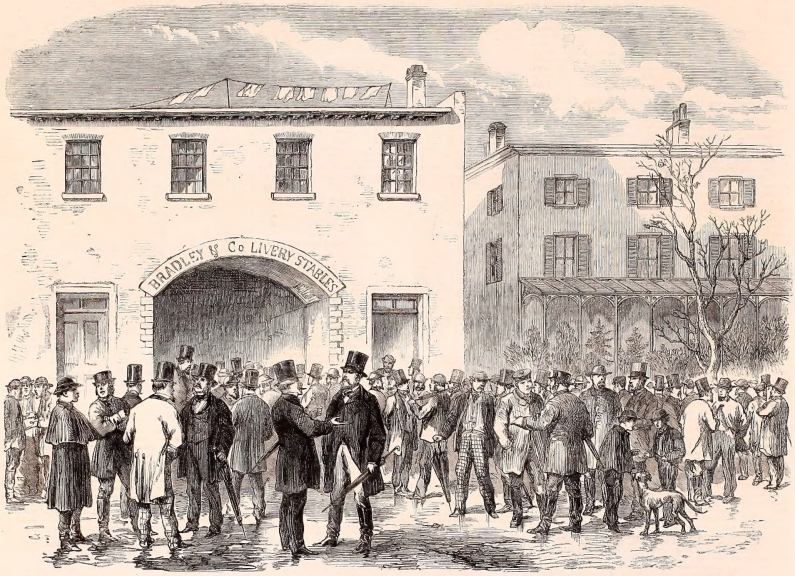
Thirty days bills	£1 per cent.	Four months bills	7½ per cent.
Two months bills	6½	Six months bills	7½
Three months bills	7

In the Bullion Exchange there have been gratuted for short periods as from 4½ to 5 per cent, if on Government Securities.

The Bank of France has advanced 25 francs per cent. to 7 to 6½, and the Bank of Turin to 7 per cent. On other parts of the Continental capital rules about as follows:—

	Open market per cent.		Bank rate per cent.	Open market per cent.
Paris	6	Turin	7	6
Vienna	6	Madrid	6	6
Berlin	6	Hamburg	6	6
Frankfort	6	Leipsic	6	6
Amsterdam	6½	St. Petersburg	6½	6

The rates of the previous week have ansented to a fraction, but only the whole of that amount has been taken for export, exclusive of several parcels of good withdrawn on Thursday, which have been taken for transmission to the interior.



The Bullion Market has been very quiet, and prices have given way.

In Stocks Home Stocks were heavy and somewhat drooping :—Consols, for Money, left off at 90¾; Ditto, for Account, 90⅝; Reduced and New Three per Cents, 90¼; Long Annuities, 1885, 8 3-16; Bank Stock, 239; India Stock, 239; Exchequer Bills, 1865, 3 pm.; Ditto, Small, 3 pm.; India Bonds, 1865, 3 pm.; Ditto, 1866, 3 pm.; Ditto, 1867, 3 pm.; Ditto, 1868, 3 pm. In Foreign Stocks the transactions have been limited. Turkish Five per Cents have been in request.

The market for Spanish Securities has ruled firm, and a considerable improvement has taken place in prices. Spanish Passive has been in demand, but only to a limited extent. Mexican Securities have fairly supported previous quotations; English Mexican Scrip has sold at 5 to 5 discount. Brazilian Bonds have been in fair request at 101 to 101½ ex div. Chilian Six per Cents have realised 101½ to 102. Portuguese Securities have been steady. Peruvian Bonds have been in moderate demand at 75 to 75½ ex div. Turkish Six per Cents have been in fair request at 51½ to 52. Greek Bonds have been steady at 52½ to 53. Egyptian Seven per Cents, 91 to 91½. Dutch Two and a-Half per Cents, 62½ to 63. ENTERTAINMENT IN A LAGER BEER SALOON.

A LAGER BEER BREWERY AT GUTTENBURG, ON THE HUDSON RIVER.

fowl. The Garten Wirthschaft, a tavern with a small pretence of rural verdure attached to its premises, is most endeared to the contemplative Teuton, who loves to take his leisure under the greenwood tree. Some of these beer gardens, especially in the eastern part of the city, are on an immense scale. There are two or three in the Bowery that can each accommodate at least a thousand sitters. A portion of these buildings opens to a small plot of ground, roofed over with glass or canvas, and sparsely studded with sickly shrubs. Generally, there is a little fountain in full play, with goldfish and small turtles swimming about in its basin. Music is always a leading attraction here. From the afternoon until a late hour of night the band performs industriously in a gallery high over head; and each musician removes the ophicleide or flute from his lips only to refresh them with a mug of lager beer. In the intervals of the music the players light their pipes or cigars, and sit gravely studying the scores before them. In some of these places there is a small stage at one end, with a piano and a stout woman in fancy costume who sings gutturally to the twanging of a monstrous guitar. The company are chiefly well-to-do mechanics and tradespeople, who bring their wives, and children with them, and even the baby is sure to be treated with a modicum of the ruddy malt. The waiters deftly wind in and out through the crowd, with three or four mugs in each hand and a couple of glasses on the top. Small girls parade up and down with little trays of sweetmeat for sale. Games of various kinds are carried on in the side alleys. There is invariably a shooting-gallery, where, at a distance of some twelve paces, the bold marksman from the Black Forest pops little shuttlecock bolts from a spring gun at a grotesque figure made of painted wood, which, on being wounded in the 'bull's-eye,' whisks round on a pivot and jerks into its place a lovely woman, also of painted wood. The walls in some of these places are adorned with cartoons of wondrous device. Sigel, the chosen war-chief of the American Germans, figures often in a terrible battle-piece, rushing, on his fiery steed, over a field thickly sown with the bodies of dying and dead Confederates.

"As in Bavaria, so in New York, most of the great breweries have bier gartens or saloons annexed to them, in which the refreshing beverage is dispensed cool and fresh from the vaults. Conspicuous on the right bank of the Hudson River, about five miles above New York, stands a tall, white, tower-like structure, with a red roof. This is the great Guttenburg brewery, built against those grand rocks called the 'Palisades,' in which its immense cellars and storehouses are excavated. In the top story of this building, which is flush with the upper road and reached by a 'Jacob's ladder' of steep steps from the lower, there is a spacious hall containing billiard-tables, a piano, and a bar for the lager beer and the pleasant vintages of the Rhine."

CRAMER'S ENGLISH PIANETTE, 22 guineas. Cramer and Co. manufacture this capital small instrument. It has all the requisites of the best Pianoforte—check action, solid truth, agreeable tone. The case is of polished ash or walnut, with full compass of 6½ octaves. The Pianette is one of the strengthened which more rapidly than on an old instrument loses in the key and warm in the hammer. In rosewood or walnut, 22 and 25 guineas.

Purchasers are particularly requested to observe that this instrument is manufactured by Cramer and Co., and has their check action; and that Cramer and Co. were the original manufacturers.

INDIAN PIANOFORTE. — CRAMER and Co. (Limited) beg to announce that they have purchased CRAMER'S PIANOFORTE, in solid mahogany, with metallic bearings, and all the improvements introduced by Cramer and Co. during the present year. This instrument is recommended for the combination of those instruments, which, for their excellent quality of tone and durability, have obtained for them the highest reputation. DISTRIBUTION OF PRIZES AT THE CRYSTAL PALACE TO THE LONDON RIFLE BRIGADE.

On Saturday afternoon the ceremony of presenting the prizes for the present year to the successful competitors in shooting among the London Rifle Brigade took place in the central transept of the Crystal Palace, in the presence of a very large assembly of visitors. The Lady Mayoress, Mrs. W. S. Hale, officiated on this occasion. She occupied a chair of state in the centre of the raised dais in front of the Handel orchestra, and was supported by the Right Hon. the Lord Mayor, Aldermen Rose, Mechi, Dakin, and Besley, Colonel Erskine (Deputy-Inspector of Volunteers), Lieutenant-Colonel Wilkinson (2nd Administrative Battalion of Middlesex), and Lieutenant-Colonel Macdonald (1st Surrey). Lady Harriet Wardle, the wife of Lieutenant-Colonel Wardle, Commander of the London Brigade, was also present, with a number of other ladies. Colonel M'Murdo, the late Inspector-General of Volunteers, arrived towards the end of the proceedings. The prizes, of the value of only £200, were arranged on tables right and left of the chair, and trophies and banners hung from every part of the grand orchestra, under the direction of Lieutenant Chesson, the Quartermaster.

The regiment, to the number of some 400 or 500 men, paraded on the upper terrace of the Palace, and marched to the quadrangle formed in front of the Handel orchestra at five o'clock. They were addressed by Lieutenant-Colonel Wards, who congratulated them on having the Lady Mayoress, in the absence of the Lord Mayor, to present their prizes that day. They had had the honour this year of being inspected by the Commander-in-Chief, and all knew the high honour of receiving his Royal Highness gave them on that occasion. There was another cause for congratulation, and that was the success of the regiment this year at Wimbledon. This was the first year they had encamped there, and their advantages had resulted from it. That the Prince of Wales had this year accepted the honour of wearing the Queen's prize; and they had three members in the first thirty and two in the second thirty—an honour never gained by any volunteer corps before. It was his pleasure to say that the brigade had enrolled 250 new members.

The Lady Mayoress then proceeded to distribute the prizes, except that of the commanding officer, which was presented by Lady Harriet Wards. Many of the well-known shots, as they came up to receive their prizes, were loudly cheered by the ranks and by friends. Pratt, the winner of the Queen's prize, presented himself to receive the gold medal as the best shot in the brigade, he was received with vociferous applause.

Lieutenant-Colonel Wards proposed a vote of thanks to the Lady Mayoress, which was responded to by the Lord Mayor; and, after a vote of thanks to Colonel M'Murdo for his presence, followed by a vote of thanks to Lieutenant-Colonel Wards, the proceedings ended.

GREAT FIRE AT DOCKHEAD, BERMONDSEY.

On Friday week, between seven and eight in the evening, a great fire broke out in the waterside premises of Messrs. Brodrick, Hewlett, Hodgson and saltpetre merchants, Mill-street, Dockhead, Bermondsey. It extended to those occupied by Messrs. Peck, Hudson, and Co.'s Patent Biscuit Works; Messrs. N. Albert Herman, lighterman; Messrs. Vogan Brothers, corn merchants, Mill Wharf; Messrs. T. Groves and Sons, lighterman; Messrs. Reid and Pigott, brewers, and the Horsleydown Old Prince of Orange Tavern, and the brewery of Messrs. Courage and Donaldson. The warehouses with which the fire first communicated contained many thousand tons of saltpetre, and, as a strong wind was blowing from south-east to south-west, the piles and blocks of saltpetre caught fire one after another, sending forth immense volumes of brightly-coloured flame and scattering smoke, ashes, and sparks upon the factories and buildings in the neighbourhood. The premises of the Patent warehouse stood another, 70 ft. long and 60 ft. deep, termed the H Extension Warehouse. This building was filled with several thousand bales of jute, and in less than a quarter of an hour it also was wrapped in flames. Indeed, there is a dispute whether the fire did not originate with the jute, which is said to be of a very spontaneous combustion, like new hay or oily cotton waste. Another warehouse next to this, named the H warehouse, was filled with jute, wheat, and saltpetre. It was impossible, by all the efforts that were made, to prevent the fire from spreading to this warehouse, as well as one or two bargesl full. The names of the vessels, the Thames, from Tooley-street, was among the first to get to work, and it was supported by two steam floating engines stationed in the Pool. But even these powerful means had no effect for some hours upon the violence of the conflagration; and upon the premises becoming ignited in which the saltpetre was stored, loud and fearful explosions took place in rapid succession, which blew down heavy brick walls and lifted the tiles and roofs of the warehouses. The explosions could try all the shipping in the Thames and three parts of London which are near the river so brightly as to have a splendid effect. The water itself shone like an immense stream of liquid gold. The fire subsided some time before midnight, but was not extinguished next day. It continued to burn through Sunday and Monday, and on Tuesday morning. The damage, which was confined mainly to the warehouses just mentioned and their contents, is estimated at about £100,000. Fragments of the jute and other stores having been saved in good condition.

BRISBANE BRIDGE, QUEENSLAND, AUSTRALIA.

The foundation-stone of the bridge which is to connect the north and south portions of the city of Brisbane, the capital of the province of Queensland, was laid, on the 22nd of August, by Sir G. Bowen, Governor of that province. The structure has commenced, from the designs of Messrs. Robson and Lanson, engineers, is to be an iron lattice bridge, with stone abutments. The dimensions of the bridge are:—Length, 1080 ft.; width, 30 ft., with a footpath on each side 6 ft. wide, so that the total width will be 42 ft. The height of the centre will be 70 ft. above high water. The contract has been let for the bridge is to be built within twenty-four months from the date of signing the contract. The actual cost of the bridge is estimated at from £40,000 to £60,000, which will be defrayed by the Corporation of the city of Brisbane. The ceremony of laying the first stone was witnessed by some fifteen hundred persons, including the Mayor, Aldermen, bodies three or four thousand unprivileged spectators who crowded both banks of the river. Our Engraving from a sketch with which a thousand correspondent has forwarded to us represents this scene. The platform, or dais, approached by a flight of steps from the river-side, was covered with carpet by Gill & Co., and Sir G. Bowen, and the Vice-Regal party; the President of the Legislative Council and the Speaker of the Legislative Assembly, the Mayor and Corporation of the city, the Mayor, Aldermen, and municipal officers; the superintending engineer, Mr. T. Oldham; the contractor, Mr. J. Bourne, and others connected with the work. There was a guard of honour formed of the Volunteer Rifles, under Captain Darby. A band of music performed the National Anthem, and the line engine was stopped on the arrival of the Governor. Having taken his seat, the Town Clerk read him an address from the Corporation, to which his Excellency made a suitable reply. After these three retired to the stone, which hung from a pair of sheer-legs in front of the platform. He took a silver trowel with ivory handle and spread the mortar beneath it, and the stone was lowered in it, and the stone, which bears record of these proceedings in the inscription engraved upon a brass plate affixed to it, was finally lowered into its proper site. This concluded the ceremony, which gave occasion for much congratulation on the rapid progress of Brisbane and Queensland during the last few years. We propose shortly to publish a View of the city, engraved from a photograph by Messrs. Freeman Brothers, of Sydney, which we have just received.

At the late sitting of the Paris Geographical Society, M. Moltke-Tarte read a letter he had received from M. Bracconnier, dated at Saint Louis, confirming the account of the death of Jules Gérard, the lion-killer, who was reported to attempting to cross the Rocky Mountains.

The Lords Commissioners of her Majesty's Treasury have authorised the Paymaster-General to pay to the treasurers of the Royal Free Hospital, and to Hugh Culling Eardley Childers, the sum of £1000, being part of a bequest made by the late Mdme. de Lilly to her Majesty for the benefit of the poor of London.

Details have been received of the marriage of her Imperial Highness Princess Isabella, eldest daughter of Pedro, Emperor of Brazil, heiress to the throne, with his Royal Highness Prince Louis Philippe of Orleans, Count d'Eu, son of the late Duke de Nemours, at the palace of Rio de Janeiro, on Oct. 15. The Princess was born on July 29, 1846, and the Prince on April 26, 1842. The ceremony, which took place in the Imperial chapel of Rio de Janeiro, was performed by the Archbishop of Bahia, according to the rites of the Roman Catholic Church. The Prince was led to the altar by the Imperial bride wore M. Pottofo (President of the Ministers) and the Marquis de Caxambu; and on the part of the Prince, Duke Augustus of Saxony and the Marquis of Glinds. General Count Dumas, a first subaltern of the Orleans family, represented the Duke de Nemours. The Prince wore the uniform of a Brazilian Marshal, to which dignity he had been raised on the same day. Dona Isabella was simply attired, her only ornaments consisting of a bracelet of pearls and diamonds, a gift of some Brazilian ladies, and of the emblem of the order of the Southern Cross. After the ceremony of marriage, and before the "Te Deum," was sung, the Emperor conferred on his son-in-law the cordon of Grand Cross of all the Brazilian orders. In memory of the day his Majesty gave freedom to all the slaves in the service of the Presidency Princess and also to twenty others belonging to private persons by their good conduct. In the evening the capital was illuminated and bands of music were stationed in various parts of the city.

THE PRESIDENTIAL CONTEST IN AMERICA.

NEW YORK, Nov. 10.

The presidential election—notwithstanding all the efforts made by Mr. Seward and others to frighten the people about attempted raids from Canada, and silly pleas to burn down New York and other cities—has passed over with the utmost quiet and decorum. The weather on Tuesday was anything but propitious; but the people were in the best of tempers, and were not even provoked into impatience by the presence of General Butler and a large military force, but went to the work of voting as peacefully as though it were a common election for a parochial or a municipal office. The result in New York was largely in favour of General M'Clellan, as most people anticipated; but everywhere else—except in Pennsylvania and Illinois—the votes have been unanimous—the contest was exceedingly close, and the votes polled much larger than usual. The returns for the more distant States have not yet been received, nor have the estimates been accurately made even in this city; but there can be no doubt of the aggregate result to prove that Mr. Lincoln has been elected by a considerable majority of the people—some say 200,000 and others 400,000—and by an electoral vote in the colleges of more than two to one. It is impossible for any critic or observer, native or foreign, who considers how violently the passions of the people have been inflamed; what antagonisms of principle, as well as conflicts of material interest, have been excited by the war; and what tremendous issues were involved in the result of the election, to avoid the expression of cordial admiration for the manly self-control which the people exhibited on the occasion. The speeches which have been delivered by the Americans themselves to have been one of the highest moral grandeur, if not of sublimity; and, though our cousins on this side of the water are somewhat too much in the habit of using fine words and fine phrases, not in hypocrisy, but because from long lines of busy men, neglecting their business for awhile to attend to the more important business of the State, and waiting patiently in long processions to vote, they have got into the habit of relieving their balloting-paper in the appointed box—using no jostling in pressing, indulging in no altercation with each other on the exciting subject which drew them together, and in every way behaving with the decorum which is shown by a fine body of men at church. Nothing can deny that the concession is abundantly merited. Rich and poor—the millionaire and the Irish coachman who drove him to the poll—the owner of the princely mansion and the poor Irish widow and the keeper of the chandler's shop or corner grocery—the employer of labour and the labourer himself—all stood quietly together, the great man neither attempting to persuade nor to coerce the little one, but leaving him free to follow his own right judgment and the duty of acting as he thought best for the interests of the country. No breach of the peace occurred during the day, either in New York or any other part of the country; and nothing like party-processions or party-fights occurred until the close of the polls, at sunset. Shortly after that time, the anxiety to learn the result drew the people out in great numbers to the newspaper and telegraphic offices, the great hotels, and other places where the returns were expected to be received until two or three o'clock in the morning, greeting each announcement of a victory for their favourite candidate in the city wards or in remoter towns with hearty cheers, and with cries of "Three cheers more!" when the result was declared. This order is always promulgated on the day of a presidential election, but is never very generally obeyed. On Tuesday, however, it was rigidly enforced, and the spirit-dealers—perhaps with a view to keep their customers in a good humour before their eyes, lent themselves to the arrangement with unwonted alacrity, and closed even the back doors, by which their favourite customers usually enter. The polls were kept open until noon on the morrow the city resumed its usual appearance. The full tide of life and business flowed as freely and rapidly as before. The result of the voting, however, did not appear to be favourably received in Wall-street, for the premium on gold rose during the day to twenty per cent as soon as it became authoritatively known that Mr. Lincoln's re-election was beyond a doubt. The Democratic party as well has been defeated with unexpected regularity—the election of Mr. Lincoln, and the hard words and unsavoury epithets in which his opponents were wont to indulge towards him while he stood in the position of a candidate ceased, as if by common consent, as soon as the election had been decided. The Democratic candidates at the late party were demoralised by their defeat. Up to the last moment, and perhaps led away by the enthusiasm which existed for General M'Clellan in the city, they had hoped that the votes of the soldiers in their candidate could be defeated; and hence did not publicly reflect upon their proper line of policy, if that event should occur. It will take time to recover from the shock which the defeat has given to their party-organisation, will keep them for a while in the background; but at the first serious reverse to Northern arms and the first real pressure of the inevitable conscription, accompanied, as these would assuredly be, with increased taxation, the Democratic party will take heart of grace, rally their broken and scattered legions, and come before the public with something like a principle on which to stand. Mr. Lincoln, on the other hand, will be supported by the whole of the Republicans, and in a speech just delivered at the White House to a large crowd who came with music and banners to congratulate him on his re-election, spoke with the greatest good feeling and good taste of the generosity and obliging of all the minorities engendered by the strife, and of his earnest desire to conciliate men of all parties. General M'Clellan, it appears, resigned his commission in the Federal army on the morning of the 8th inst., and before the result could possibly be anticipated on better ground than the hope of either party. Should Mr. Lincoln refuse to accept the resignation and appoint his unsuccessful rival to such high command as would be worthy of his character, and (in spite of his defeat) his undoubted popularity, warrant the President in giving and the General in accepting, he will effect a masterstroke of policy. It remains to be seen whether he will be magnanimous enough to do so.

A general court of the Hudson's Bay Company was held on Monday—when the report of the Land Committee, which we mentioned was announced, and some discussion and explanation resulted regarding the recent purchase of the Company's territories in North America. The discussion in commenting upon the state of the company's affairs, and in reply to several individuals, explained that the fur trade was an increasing one. The value of the skins imported by the company in 1861 was £210,309; in 1862 it rose to £216,708; again, in 1863, to £222,727; and in 1864 the amount was £262,869. The board could, moreover, anticipate an advance of £30,000 or £40,000 during the current year. As regarded the disputed Oregon territory, should the American and English commissioners not succeed in agreeing, it had been decided that the King or Italy would arbitrate between the parties. The company had offered the Government to construct telegraphic lines, but not nationals. Gold had been found on the company's territories east of the Rocky Mountains. Land and plantages were also there. The board were not prepared to say how much land they intended to retain for settlers, but they were also sensible of the importance of protecting the interests of the shareholders in the fur trade.

MEMBERS OUT OF PARLIAMENT.

Most persons suppose that there are only two leaders of parties in the House of Commons. Recent experience of out-of-door speechmaking would lead to a different conclusion, or at least would tortune to an idea that there is considerable independence of leadership, a circumstance which might be made apparent on close observation during a Session. It is no violent presumption to suppose that Mr. Disraeli begins to think that allegiance to him is divided amongst the Conservatives. Lord Derby has his followers, by his tuftedness, his stateliness, which may even sometimes be mistaken for indolence; his apparent disdain of the House of Commons as a drill-master of his forces; in short, everything which bespeaks confidence in himself, and the insensible influence he exercises on his rank and file, may be inclined to trace symptoms of alarm on his part in a sort of coup-d'etat which he made the other day in Buckinghamshire. It must have been a severe blow to his self-confidence before he was released his sudden appearance—using the word pretty much as Defoe did in reference to Mrs. Veal's apparition. His brother the Rector is no antity of the audience was striking; but the motive which he made manifest was somewhat new. It was nothing less than to proclaim a public reconciliation between him and the rebellious Premier. The scene must have been affecting in itself, but its significance lay deeper. If the small assurance of Buckinghamshire had been relishing out by personal courtesy, how much more was it necessary to set up an opposition to the policy of Lord Stanley, who at first had pronounced his policy and asserted his pretensions as a public man; and, as it happens, by a curious perversity and inconsequence, as a Conservative leader in the House of Commons? It was necessary for the chief ex esse to make a bid against the chief in posse; it was indispensable to declare a policy. Now, it has been pronounced by Mr. Disraeli that if he has a policy at all it is the preservation of the connection between Church and State. Upon this he has taken his stand. The opportunity which it is presumed he desired of addressing a speech to his party and to the nation was found in the meeting at the Sheldonian Theatre at Oxford, on the object of which we conceive it to increase the incomes of curates in the diocese.

It was a memorable declaration. There was Mr. Walter, who seems recently to have adopted a jocose style, which reminds one of the illustrative line describing Asia's efforts some vast rock to throw; there was Mr. Disraeli, who has all himself to blame if he is supposed to be quite another man to that which he is in the town of Oxford, being a man of mystery; and Mr. Hubbard, whose functions were enunciated in the former; there was Mr. Hubbard, who, himself a builder of churches, has a special right to advise his party against briskness on any such subject as church extension in any manner; there was Colonel North to give the weight of country membership to the occasion; and the sum and substance of it brought his party master in hand, and was characteristic more or less; but they did not think it worth while to be present. Mr. Lowe, in his place, made a more able, interesting, and eloquent speech perhaps he never delivered. It was, however, one which afforded more pleasure to read than to have heard, in print, on account of the quantity of the constituency while it was being spoken, one could not have forgotten who the man was who spoke. The arguments were keen and subtle, and the observations recondite, but apt; the criticisms had the true ring of self-assumption which belongs to modern criticism; and the whole carefully sprinkled and set with superlatives for the whole. But if ever a realistic view of the Church was enunciated, here it was. Not to dwell on a point which is too easy to think, it was the more one to handle, let it be summed up in a word or two, that, according to Mr. Disraeli, the Church is a political engine of great power, and one which, in that point of view, he will, for political purposes, support with all his might; but so far as the spirit of that object for which the machinery was originally contrived, he does not attach as much trace of it to be observed as in the equally characteristic remark of the late Mr. Canning, that he had become the Dean of Canning's pottle-deep, staggered against an ecclesiastical edifice, and, patting the wall affectionately, exclaimed "Never mind (using a most irreverent epithet) I will stand by you to the last."

Mr. Cobden is presumed to be another political leader; but the question is, how far? He has it in his power to lift up his voice, Mr. Bright; but that is very much to be questioned, unless, indeed, in the sense in which the Duke of Wellington was supposed to lead an infant. A large section of public opinion, then? Well, perhaps; but that is not to be tested by the circumstances that he can command large—overwhelmingly large—audiences to listen to his very reasonable and interesting speeches. As regards that, it is just possible that at the next election Mr. Cobden may be returned by his name so prominently before the people of Rochdale. Lord Ellesborough, it will be remembered, was accepted by that borough to listen to his "adorned eloquence." Nay, if Mr. Cobden had got hold of a tangible object—one which could be palpably worked before the eyes of the people—he might be the leader of them now, on the score of want of youth—he might be backed for carrying it out against any odds. But the desire to agree with the philosophies with him in that which is the result of his sincere convictions, one cannot somehow get rid of a notion that there is something shadowy and vapless, unsubstantial, and, in a word, unreal in such a line of active politics. His very illustrious smack of unconscious unreality. Would any one of the large audiences to listen to his unrivalled statistics with regard to the finances of America as these on which he dilates, or to that which when he was dealing with the question of prohibition of foreign corn? Rumour goes that Mr. Cobden has been a sufferer by the doctrine of American republican, and therefore he is not likely to have much sympathy given him as impulsion to that doctrine, as some people profess to see, in that part of his speeches which relates to the Irish Church. It may be supposed that Mr. Cobden is a hard-headed, cold, calculating utilitarian—the truth is, that he is a man of sensibility, really sympathetic, in truth, of impulse. In times gone by he was in strict training for a great work; but as he has confessedly renounced the calling of a Reformer, and has entered completely into rest, he gives himself up to his natural bent, and yields himself to the influences of an impulsive nature. Mr. Bright, it is to be supposed, would give him credit for. He is essentially a lobby-rider, and at one time he rode straight, with a tight rein and a steady purpose to be seen; a predetermination to go where he thought he ought, content to take occasional airings, and to allow of all sorts of gambolings and pranksings while on the road, provided that he could be brought whenever he pleases, with the world with his hobby-horsemanship. As he distinctly says he does not mean to be Prime Minister, the question of policy may be subject to strict criticism; and as his speeches are specially sui generis, no one could wish them altered down to the level of commonplace, unintelligible.

In the House of Commons, for a member to be "lord of himself" is generally looked on as a term of reproach of way. Mr. Newdegate seems to be realising that notion to himself. It would appear that his experience of the management of the Poor-law has led him to consider that he is, in some sense a grand, but in a practical sense rather a ridiculous, position in Parliament to find oneself without a party to support one. It is not always the attitude which Mr. Newdegate has deliberately created for himself; but, some other members of the Session of Parliament which do not like it. They acknowledge that it is a distinction; but, though a man of looking at the usefulness of their members, and have their own ideas of political virtue. However that may be, in the case of North Warwickshire, there are many who would urge on that ingenuous gentleman to cede their cherished fancies for one in favour of Mr. Newdegate. Idiosyncrasy in members is in a drooping condition; public sameness of characteristic is spending; and, even in a new Parliament, it is just questionable—although you may get a few new members—whether you will obtain new characters. There is little standing out in bold relief; and at the root of that fusion of party of which we hear so much, may lie the want of political individuality. This being so, it is not unreasonable to hope that, in the coming changes and chances, Mr. Newdegate may be spared to the House. On similar grounds a prayer might be preferred on behalf of Mr. Cox, of whose social qualifications the Speaker for Finsbury, which had been recently provoked, we hope yet to have a word or two to say.

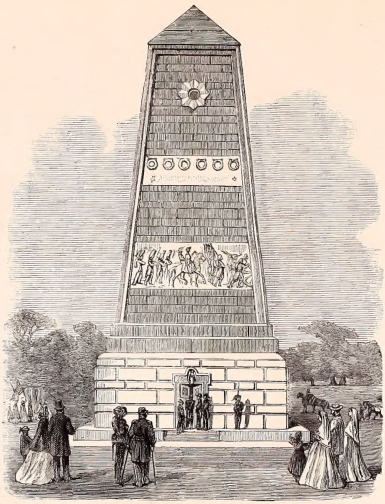
ECHOES OF THE WEEK.

IF Archdeacon Hale's "Grosses at Truth" there is a hint about originality worth remembering. A great poet told him that one day he believed that he had an original thought, but that "the next day he was disgusted at finding it in some commonplace author as Beyle." So people nowadays are aware that Macaulay did not originate the "New Zealander," which belongs partly to Volney and partly to Rider Wilder; and when here say that Paul Louis Courier was not original when he said "Rest and be thankful," an inscription at the head of Florence, and upon which Wordsworth's thirty years ago, made no remark; and that Mr. Cobden, in comparing the Blacks to the Mussiepuk, alluded to that extreme and mad laudation of the New World of which he is so fond, was only "lagging" a simile from Sir Francis Head. The great John Dennis complained of the actors of his day that they would not lie naturally, but they were always great in stealing his thunder. Happily, we are so surrounded with critics that the theft of anyone's particular property is requisitely noticed and placed, not to the credit of the usurping demi-god who wields it, but to the Jupiter to whom it originally belonged.

While Mr. Lincoln is getting up a proclamation, hinted at by General Butler after the episode of the double revolvers, which will offer to the Southerners an unconditional surrender, leaders and all, they will be at once return to their Northern brethren, the Canadians are debating under what name their country should henceforward be known. Some propose Canadia, differing only in one letter; but others, to mark their origin and the pride they have in it, propose New Britain, Britannia, and Victoria. The unanimity of feeling amongst all classes is very delightful. Even the Yankee reporter of the New York Herald, a gentleman who, we presume, has not been and then been expelled for rebelling "Canadian blue-noses" and throwing mud at "old Mother England," could not fail to be struck with the fine attachment shown to the mother country. It appears to have at once astonished and perplexed him. It cannot, however, fail to gratify us. Britain does not want, in spite of Mr. Bernal Osborne, Mr. Chancellor Falkland, or Mr. Lowe from her colonies. The war in America has done her and them this service—it has united them both, the constitution type now is really the freest in the world, and that the bonds which bind them in allegiance to the mother country, though as strong as steel, are, as they wear them, as light as silken fetters.

Do not we all wish, sometimes, that Rousseau spoke the truth?—and may not perhaps we, in these times, wish the same of the late Speaker of Comptroller of Her Majesty's Stationery, vacant by the death of Mr. J. B. Bowes? Is the office abolished, or is it to be conferred upon Russell? The other rumour—which has much less basis for it—was, that the author of "Tom Brown's School Days," Mr. Thomas Hughes, had been appointed to fill the vacant Police Reserve of the Factory Regulations—at £1000 a year. The fitness of a barrister and novelist for this office is recommended for by the fact that Mr. Hughes is a better Major of merit and efficiency; but he has written to the Spectator to deny that there is any truth in the report. As a rule, literary men deserve well of their country, and when they do they would be, we should be, rewarded by his Majesty the Public. Whether they should be taken up from the pavement, as the Duke of Wellington was struck out of them in the American Executive; but that is hardly a model to be imitated. Now we find, as we have so often done, a precedent for the insurance of Mr. M'Culloch, a gentleman who, having devoted himself to statistical literature, was well fitted for his post, we believe that he rather in an exceptional one. Mr. Lowe has given Mr. Hawkins a seat and fishes as far away from the men of the pen as possible. If we pay and reward a valuable author, we practically damage the genius and fertility: if we reward a second-rate writer we disgust and annoy all the rest. Mr. Hughes pen more likely, we think, would be, indeed, a queer and unheard-of sight, says Mr. Bigelow, to see

> The upsetter rigged out in their swallowtail coats,
> To preach down an oligarchy!



Mr. Lowe, on our part, we do not envy his post. It would be, despite aptitude authors. A pension of £60 a year when he is broken and poor work is as much as any one of us need fear.

There was a story of Sir Robert Peel that Christmas, as well as "Donato," is coming. We have the Cattle Show announced; and, as country cousins to that show—we want a new word—the Dogs. We may expound the riddle by saying that he is a one-legged Spanish dancer of whom we shall see Richard Doyle's pencil, and Planché has written all his life; how many hundred volumes he had written the story does not say, but it ends, very properly, that Planché turned away, and never had any confidence in the man afterwards.

Yes, Christmas is coming! We have entered on the yule month, and are to be amused by Christmas literature. "Are you civil?" Every one has been asked that question, which might head a tract or a modern farce, and which is the title for some Christmas number of a cheap paper. Messrs. Chambers give us "Tenants at Will;" Mr. Dickens has "Cousin Jasper's Legacy," that mature of Edwin Drood, having been such a favourite last year that she is recalled this; Mrs. Jones holds her evening party, and the fourteen Christmas stories are all launched in and upon London Society. The literature and art there are plenty of novelties for Christmas. Mr. Millais's "First Sermon," and "Second Sermon," exhibiting together, are to be engraved; a new society of water colours has been formed, and will exhibit in the Dudley Gallery, Egyptian Hall. Mrs. Wood has another novel ready for Christmas. Dr. Wheldon, most liberal of literary writers, commences the story "Sir Jasper's Tenant" in Temple Bar, which is called "a supper's Legacy," that matron of Edwin Drood abroad house; so that by night, as well as by day, this memorial of Magenta will proclaim itself afar.

Beneath the chapel, which, as already remarked, forms the basement, a large crypt has been reserved, wherein to receive the bones and mortal remains of the brave men who died in the cause of Italian liberty on the plain of Magenta; and in the interior of the chapel itself four immense bronze plates bearing their honoured names occupy a superficies of forty square yards on the walls of the Cella, or little chapel.

According to present arrangements, this memorial of Italian gratitude to France will be inaugurated with much solemnity on the approaching anniversary of the Battle of Magenta, June 4, 1865.

DISASTROUS STORM AND SHIPWRECKS AT THE MOUTH OF THE TYNE

We regret to observe that additional interest, though of a very mournful kind, has now been given to Mr. Duncan's picture of "The Lifeboat off Tynemouth Bar," a coloured engraving of which was presented to our subscribers with the number of this Journal for Oct. 1. In the storm which raged along the north-eastern shore of England on Thursday and Friday week, Tynemouth and its neighbourhood witnessed some of the most lamentable shipwrecks that have ever happened so close to a home port. It was about five o'clock on Thursday afternoon when the iron screw steam-ship Stanley, trading between Aberdeen and London, while steering her way into the Tyne for shelter, struck upon the rocks called the Black Middens, on the northern shore of the estuary, near the Spanish Battery at Tynemouth. It was then moderate in a north-easterly wind, with rain falling and the sea increasing fearfully. From the cries that reached the shore from the stranded ship it was ascertained that there were seven women and children aboard, and that the steamer had a deckload of cattle above, and a crew of nine men. As the sea broke through the darkness and thickening mists around, the crew and passengers were driven into the Preventive men stationed at the Spanish Battery, with a number of the boatmen and other inhabitants of Tynemouth, immediately got the apparatus for the rescue of persons from shipwreck down upon the river Coal Line. A rocket was fired and communication was made with the vessel. A whip line and hawser were connected to the ship, and the cradle was sent off to bring the crew and passengers ashore. The master and seaman appointed assistant to the life-saving party went off, and they got a woman on a cradle with a seaman to take her ashore, but the great mass had had to be drawn in again. The master and officers then got the life-boat out, and placed three women in it, and three sailors, but on getting it over the side the davits broke. Two of the seamen scrambled into the vessel again, but the second and one of the sailors were swept away and drowned, their cries and the cries of the affrighted passengers and crew terrifying the hearts of those watching by this time had gathered in the darkness and rain upon the cliffs. The examiner was then sent off, and it was found that the life-saving lines were ineffectual to do more in rescuing the crew and passengers' efforts directed from the cliffs, and the apparatus was placed in a cart and sent to the Low Lights, where a few of the men aboard a tug steamer, to ascertain if it could approach the vessel, so that the lines might be extended in the same manner to the ship. From this position, the boats could not approach sufficiently near to be of any avail to the perishing crew and passengers. The Tynemouth pilot-boat Constance (the same that was represented in our coloured engraving), made a gallant attempt to save the crew of the schooner, which was further in towards the river than the steam-vessel, but was driving alongside, a treacherous sea broke aboard of her, smashed nearly all the bulwarks, the bowsprit, and the mast. Four of the men, knowing that she would go to pieces and drown them all, sprang into the schooner, and were soon washed off. Two of those (Edward Robson, James Grant) were drowned; the other two, after many perilous life-belts on, swam ashore. The life-boat, in her crippled state, with all her gear lost, fortunately drove into the Low Lights, where she was picked up by the William Wake, another life-boat, and towed to the Shields. Another attempt was then made, with the exception of those who had jumped aboard the schooner, were landed in safety. Upon getting the apparatus to the Low Lights the Preventive men were unable to get the steamboat master to the cradle, and he was left going out into the sea with his vessel, and all further efforts to rescue the people on board of her they were from land. About twenty-five minutes to eleven the schooner seemed to slide off the ledge of rocks where she was stranded, and immediately turned over. The cries of her drowning crew were heard by the people ashore, and then they and their vessel disappeared from sight. More than once a horrible wail was heard from the ship, and it was then supposed that she was breaking up; but it was not until an hour after midnight that the last of the ported sandships, having been cut to separate pieces. The prow and fore part of the vessel was afterwards turned round by the force of the sea, while the stern part lay in its first position, seven in or about a line. It is supposed that some of the persons on board went down into the foaming billows at the time when the ship was first struck. Those who remained aboard met on the fore part of the ship, where they remained till five or six o'clock in the morning, when the rocket apparatus from Collercoats was used to exact effect, and the shore; and by these means passengers and about twenty sailors were rescued. Twenty-one passengers, half of these being women, and five of the seamen, with the captain's wife, lost from the Stanley; six men were drowned in the Friendship; and six of the Tynemouth Bar pilot-boat men, the Stanley was a fine ship of 502 tons burden, built at Hartlepool, only six years ago. She was commanded by Captain Howling, and had 1,000 quarters on board, and was forty days out when she left London for Aberdeen on the Wednesday evening. The rocks where she struck at Tynemouth, a few hundred yards from the wreck, were strewn on Friday and Saturday, with dead bullocks, casks, bales, and other miscellaneous articles washed out of the broken vessel. Many of the bullocks, it is stated, by Mr. Nichols, will give some notion of the scene.

The Admiralty intended to let me with much other damage to shipping on that part of the coast, has been severely felt; and from Scaburgh to the mouth of a similar disaster—the loss of the screw-steamer Dalhousie, trading between Dundee and Newcastle, which came to destruction at the mouth of the Tay on the same Thursday night, under circumstances corresponding with those of the wreck of the Stanley, at the mouth of the Tyne. Twelve passengers and twelve men, with Captain Gleany and his mate, were drowned.

NEW CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH AT ST. LEONARDS.

The new Congregational Church at St. Leonards, of which we give a representation, is a large building in the Early Gothic style, and stands on a lofty elevated site. It is constructed of brick and has a long and fit. wide, with side aisles, which are divided from the nave by ornamental piers and timber pointed arches filled in with ornamental lodged tracery. Above is a clerestory of small circular headed openings, and the roof is of open timber, framed with arches and circular tie-beams. The principal light is a large window of five of the western end of the nave, and the sanctuary has the same height as the nave, with a vestry in a room formed by a bold Gothic arch with granite shafts and carved capitals; and above, in the recess, are the organ and singers' gallery, which projects into the church.

The exterior is adorned with a fine row of large Gothic traceried windows of different patterns, with gabled canopies over, and the walls are covered with slates laid in patterns and bands of different colours. At the principal front is a lofty tower and pitched spire. This is so placed as to form a very prominent feature from the principal road, and it is a very conspicuous object in the landscape, being visible from a considerable distance. The belfry windows are filled with open tracery. The principal entrances are under the tower. These are wide and massive doors, and afford ample means of ingress and egress. Beneath is a large and light school-room, the entire size of the church; and in the rear are minister's and deacons' vestries and the usual offices. The principal windows are filled in with stained glass, the gift of a friend.

The church is built of the local stone of the country, given by Mr. Thomas Spalding, from a quarry on his estate at Ore Place. The dressings are of Bath stone. The architect is Mr. Edward Habershon, 37, Bedford-place, Russell-square. The builder is Mr. S. Rogers, Tottenham-court-road. The cost of the church and schoolroom, including the freehold site, will exceed £8000. The minister of this church and congregation is the Rev. Andrew Reed, B.A.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

What Men have said about Women. Compiled and analytically arranged by Henry Southgate; with Illustrations by J. D. Watson. (4 vol. Routledge, Warne, and Routledge.) A very elegant volume, dedicated to the most elegant of all subjects; for Burns is not far wrong when he says of Nature—

> An' then she made the lassies, O!

Mr. Southgate has collected together passages in prose as well as in verse, from small as well as large volumes, and has given a selection of her who is the object of homage in all civilized countries. He has very properly abstained from making a paltry, inappropriate book, such as he might have made had he suffered himself to be led away by the love of quotation. In this he could discover in the course of his reading which seemed tributary to woman's excellence, and he has refused, still more wisely, perhaps, from recording what cynics have written in women's disparagement. Mr. Southgate has, therefore, most not be looked for amongst the authors on whom Mr. Southgate has levied contributions. In fact, we are inclined to think that any "daughter of Eve" who does her impressions of "what men have said," and has in the habit of saying, "about woman from Mr. Southgate's compilation will not be disappointed. The educated men and very well satisfied with herself, even if she do not run the risk of becoming slightly conceited. When we declare that Mr. Southgate has quoted sayings, with respect to widowhood, matrimony, and bachelorhood, for the most part highly complimentary to women, from more than two hundred authors, we think we have said enough to prove that widows, matrons, and maidens can no longer complain that there is no mirror which will do them justice; let them look at the reflection of themselves in Mr. Southgate's book and be satisfied—let them be encouraged. At the same time we fear that they are truly but "little lower than the angels." Mr. Southgate describes himself as having wandered through the fields of literature, and having picked up here and there a few flowers, which he has in charming bouquet, which any woman of taste must admire. We should not be surprised to learn that the choice of the flowers in the compilation are studded with a few illustrations due to the pencil of Mr. J. D. Watson. The execution of the illustrations is in our opinion, the young girl facing p. 125: there is much simplicity, modest innocence, ease of attitude, and joyousness of expression, perfectly natural and free from affectation. The others in this set of illustrations we were not so favourably impressed.

A Diary in Rhyme, by W. Jerrold. (1 vol. W. H. Allen and Co.) Mr. Jerrold says, "M. About (whom I have followed from the day when he gave 'Tolla' to the world, and whose last book touches my heart more than the rest) has written a 'Nineteenth Century,' and the same thing may be said of Mr. Jerrold—he modestly lays claim to the title of Nineteenth Century. We think that this assertion will be apparent to anyone who will read chapters 1, 2, 3, and 14 of the work we have under notice. Nor does the author confine himself to the nineteenth century, for he gives us many facts for the knowledge of which, whether they have been or are likely ever to be, of any benefit to us, we are not at all prepared to tell. He writes as one who is well acquainted with Paris and Parisian men and manners, and as a thorough Bohemian order; he wields it readily pen, and he has a pleasant, readable style.

Clerical Education. By Charles William Smith. (1 vol. Simpkin, Marshall, and Co.) The author of this book has made the startling discovery of the "extraordinary fact that, although Great Britain is pre-eminently the country of the Bible, there is no country where it is nowhere else so much neglected;" or of the melancholy truth that "in the Church of England this neglect is greater than in any other profession." The author complains that the Bible is not a book of study to be heard, or rather read, upon the subject. His little book, then, undoubtedly, is intended to remedy this, and he himself seems to hold correct views with respect to the use of the voice and the laws of pronunciation, and the duties of female lecturers, however, appear to us entirely useless, for, if any person of moderate education can read the Bible correctly, "or," as the author of "Lord Gord," or "Chaucer," of the "Book of Edda, or of the "Nibelungen Lied," he will be guilty of the heartstopping opposition to general practice; and if they hear not their friends and neighbours read correctly, they will be few enough to find fault. Nor can we imagine that the clergy, as a body, require to be warned against pronouncing the commencement of Hamlet's famous soliloquy into the following fashion:—

against recommending husbands to love their wives, against speaking of Solomon as the wisest man that ever lived, against speaking or talking of an asper or a subjec, or "certain lewd fellows of the baser sorte," or "certain Heavys," against announcing the text for Sunday nex they purpose (or purpos), &c. Mr. Smith passes some very severe, and no doubt deserved, strictures upon quack professors of elocution; but there is no quack in the clergy, and the pronunciation of his own ability as a teacher; and he forces the reader to the conclusion that he considers himself infallible. Still the clergy generally cannot do better (in Mr. Smith's opinion) than betake himself for instruction to Mr. Charles William Smith. He gives, amongst other pieces of critical information, the following copyhook sentence as "a new to many—" "Humble-pie" is an incorrect spelling of 'umble-pie,' and is derived from 'numbles,' a plain name for the entrails of beasts. To eat umble-pie' is to eat of the poorest dish."

First Help in Accidents. By Henry G. Schnitzle, M.D. Ph. D. (1 vol. Robert Hardwicke.) A particularly useful little volume, well adapted for the pocket. It treats of the more common accidents to which, in the ordinary course of events, we are liable in life, and it contains short and clear instructions as to the treatment to be adopted in such emergencies, until the aid of a medical man or surgeon can be obtained. Soldiers and others who are, from the nature of their occupations, especially exposed to casualties, will, we should think, find it a very valuable guide in their hands.

Lyra Mystica. Edited by the Rev. Orby Shipley, M.A. (1 vol. Longmans.) In this volume the "Lyra Mystica" of Christopher "Lyra Messianica" have received in many quarters the meed of praise, and his "Christian Year" will not be forgotten, while poets and moderns have been pressed into his service, and the result is a collection of "hymns and verses on sacred subjects" which bear witness to the reverence for the Church of the compilers, and to a more than usual quaint than good, but others breathe the beauty both of holiness and of poetry. The volume is, on the whole, a pleasant one, and will regularly taper accord with the contents; an air of beauty, solemnity and antiquity will probably thrown over all.

New Echoes, and other Poems. By Eliza Cook. (1 vol. Routledge, Warne, and Routledge.) Eliza Cook long since earned her place amongst the English poetesses of the day, and she does not rank by those utterances of her muse. She is spirited, easy, sympathetic, and her verses flow on like a rippling stream; she is not a lyre; our Saxin may not find their civil spirits banished by the music of her harp; but the lesser minds and the lowlier hearts will be moved by her sentiment and conducted to a higher.

Great Inventors. (1 vol. Ward and Lock.) A "profusely" illustrated little book about knives and printing, and many other inventive men and their inventions. The volume is, of course, a compilation, and the illustrations are, for the most part, (appearings a somewhat touchuefol), borrowed from anywhere and everywhere, including Herr Auerbach's "Familien-Kalender" for 1858, for, at p. 59, we have a portrait of Jacob Auerbach's invention, and at p. 60 a wood-cut which is a facsimile of the portrait of Christian Gellert at p. 5 of the "Familien-Kalender" for 1858. Now, as Herr Auerbach's invention "Arkwright bears of Key from a neighbour's wife," which, oddly enough, is the very illustration which Lieut. C. F. Walker has been promoted to the rank of Commander in her Majesty's Fleet; H. B. Harry, Esq., Surgeon to be Inspector of Anatomy and Physiology; Mr. Fairgrieve to be First-class Assistant-Engineer in her Majesty's Fleet.

General Wynyard, C.B., Colonel of the 58th Regiment of Foot, died on Thursday week. General George Irving died on the 22nd ult., at Belmont, near Kirkcudbright, aged ninety-one.

The Armstrong and Whitworth Investigation Committee, on Tuesday, made a trial of quick firing, the 12-pounder Armstrong breech-loader field-piece at Shoeburyness. The first fifty rounds were fired in six minutes with fifty-eight seconds. The next round unfortunately was fired the second fifty in six minutes and thirty-seven seconds. This is less than eight rounds a shot, which the gun had easily done in the first instance from the limber, sixteen yards in the rear, at it in action.

The front of the bow of the Royal Frigate Bellerophon, under construction at Chatham, is intended to mount a couple of 300-pounder guns, which will fire straight ahead when going clear in smooth water. The bow is also intended to place a rifle tower on the upper deck, rising to a height of about 14 ft., and this will be protected with armour, as will also the two armour-plates. From this tower the orders will be conveyed below by means of the telegraph, while it will at the same time afford shelter for the steersman.

THE VOLUNTEER MOVEMENT.

The London volunteers had a grand day on Saturday last. Several regiments were inspected, and in other prizes were distributed. We give an interesting and spirited sketch elsewhere of the ceremony of distributing the prizes to the London Rifle Brigade by the Lady Mayoress at the Crystal Palace.

Lieutenant-Colonel M'Murdo inspected the Inns of Court Volunteers regularly known as the "Devil's Own," the Barbarous Part after "roving" companies and going through other preliminary drill at Shoreditch, but was formed in Richmond Park at two o'clock, and shortly afterwards the Inspector-General arrived on the ground, and was received with a general salute. The Inns then marched past in quick time to its favourite air of "Nancy Dawson," and afterwards performed the various evolutions of field day, riflemen movements being executed in twenty minutes in perfect order. At the close of the inspection, Colonel M'Murdo expressed the satisfaction he had felt at the general high performance of the day. He said, with reference to one movement—that of receiving cavalry in line—that for days of review and manœuvres it was certainly take the place of the old arrangement of forming square, at least when there was time for the men to use their rifles against the attacking horse. It was for this reason that he further advocated the employment of breech-loaders. He also pointed out effective manœuvre in which the line had been kept up when advancing in line, a movement which he regretted was not practised by the regular Army, as he was the natural regime of men for bowing up a wavering enemy.

The annual winter inspection and presentation of prizes to the London Scottish took place in the evening in Westminster Hall. The corps, after being put through several evolutions which kept them in line and frequently in motion, formed in close column of half companies, after which they were inspected by Lord Elcho and Lady Elcho, Lord Ruthven, Lord Wemyss, and shortly afterwards the Inspector-General arrived on the ground, and was received with a general salute. The corps then marched past in quick time to its favourite air of "Nancy Dawson," and afterwards performed the various evolutions of field day, riflemen movements being executed in twenty minutes in perfect order. At the close of the inspection, Colonel M'Murdo expressed the satisfaction he had felt at the general high performance of the day. He said, with reference to one movement—that of receiving cavalry in line—that for days of review and manœuvres it would

MARGARET DENZIL'S HISTORY.

Annotated by her Husband.

(Reprinted from "The Cornhill Magazine.")

"The author, having invented a striking and even startling story, has managed to relate it originally. . . . The story which we condense from the original is full of interest."—The Times.

"Strikingly original in the author's style of intellect. It contains many passages of great elegance. There is a vast amount of ingenious construction, with the best surprise which any work of fiction has produced for many a day. . . . It will rank with the Seven Sons of Mr. Forster, the Scarlet Letter, &c."—Bell's Messenger.

EDUCATION.

POLITICIANS of every class—Ministerial and unattached, party and independent, aggressive and defensive—have of late united in an assertion that England has been freed in a great measure from the burden of foreign policy. Henceforth that portion of the labours of our statesmen and our legislators is to be reduced to the minimum, and all the excellent talent which has been expended on the elaborate and more or less skilful conduct of that department of the State is to lie fallow. Only in those undefined extremities in which the interest and the honour of this country are distinctly involved are we as a people, through the medium of our Executive, to make or meddle in the affairs of the outer world. As a rule, the cases of exception being temporary and abnormal, our colonies are taking great pains that their affairs shall impose no special trouble upon the active agency or agitate the mind of the parent State. The doctrine of charity beginning, and by a not infrequent if not inevitable consequence ending, at home, is declared to be extended in all its strictness to the conduct of the affairs of this nation. Our own immediate and material concerns are to be our sole consideration, and not an idea is to be cherished which does not distinctly embody the principle of the direct good and advantage of the body politic. The romance of statesmanship is to cease and determine. If the acceptation of this theory is complete, its logical result is laid down to be a concentration of all the energies of the people and their rulers in the perfection of our social system, as implied in the rectangular adjustment of political rights, the rigid amendment of our laws, the development of sanitary improvement, and the extension of education in its widest sense. In short, to carry out the programme and to cause the dissolution, from mere want of fields of action, of the Society for the Promotion of Social Science.

Pending the advent of this national millennium, and apart from the abstract utterings of its prophets, it is happily the case that numbers of sensible persons are doing their best to carry out the practical parts of this scheme without caring to wait for a solemn inauguration of its theory. Especially to one point has the consideration of thoughtful and patriotic men been directed; and much discussion and no little tentative action has of late been applied to the question of national education, using the word in its most comprehensive meaning. Hitherto the term national education has been applicable to one part of the subject only; but its intent has now been greatly magnified, and the question has entered into a new phase. The real principles, and the adaptation in its integrity of the education of the people to its legitimate objects and in its several degrees of usefulness, are evidently so much in the contemplation and in the serious ponderings of those whom circumstances have placed in the position of leaders of public opinion, that it is hardly possible but that they will ere long be fully and generally understood; and, after that, their application and their diffusion is only a question of time and due preparation.

It is not so many years ago that the principle of the education of the people was recognised in this country at all, at least so far as it was a concern of the State. Indeed, even at this time, it is with many a moot point whether this is a matter in which the State ought to interfere; and what has been done and is doing under Government administration is only half accepted as a necessity which, somehow or the other, has not been met by spontaneous remedies. The groundwork of the system which is called—for want of a better name, inasmuch, at least, as it overstates two thirds of its reality—national education, is its subjection to voluntary efforts in affording instruction to a large body of the people. In its origin and object it was intended to apply, and in the main does apply, only to one class. Whatever may be the differences of opinion as to the details of its working; however local influences, individual theorising, and sectarian impracticability may have clogged and deadened the march of its operations; it is, on the whole, admitted that the so-designated national education has proved a great boon and a great good to the class for which it was intended, and to the requirements of which it has been adapted. Indeed, so rapid has been its extension, if it is to be tested by the steady increase of its demands upon the public money voted by Parliament for its support, that cautious administrators have taken alarm lest under such advantage should be taken of the bounty of the State, and a check be given to that voluntary principle which political economists deem to be the vital element in the educational life of this country. Hence all sorts of devices have been adopted to direct Government aid to what is considered to be its true purpose—that of stimulating a self-originating system, and to check all tendencies towards the establishment of a scheme of State education, in the Continental acceptation of the term. It is probable that out of the midst of the controversies and discussions which were born of this attempt at prevention on the part of the Government sprang the feeling that, while so much care and so much money were expended in providing for the education of what, in no spirit of depreciation, we will call the lowest classes of the community, the education of the other classes had been overlooked, and, having been left wholly without wholesome supervision, had run rather to seed.

This discovery led to the appointment of the Commission of Inquiry into our great public schools. It is not too much to say that the result of that inquiry has been to show that in these splendid and wealthy establishments a system prevailed which placed them behind the age in a comprehensive educational sense. In spite of traditions and respectable prejudices, there is every probability that the spirit of reform will force its way into these institutions; and, as they possess all the means and appliances for vigorous reconstruction within themselves, and need no external help, they may well be left out of the purview of immediate and pressing necessity. However, tardy, they cannot escape from the utilising tendency of the time.

But another result has been indirectly gained from this special inquiry. The question of middle-class education has been raised in so animated and engrossing a shape that it is fast ripening for a settlement. It is now widely known and felt that there is a large portion of the population of the country the educational requirements of which could not be met by the curriculum of our public schools, even if the means of attaining it were not wanting, while the same difficulty stood in the way of the sending of middle-class children to those private schools which are modelled on our public schools, both as regards teaching and expense. As a rule, there was only the alternative of the endowed grammar schools, which are scattered throughout the country, and which, in the progress of their ancient founders, were intended as miniature Etons and Harrows, and their advantages, such as they are, chiefly confined to the children of members of the Established Church, and those wonderful academies which, according to advertisements, afford the most complete education together with all the comforts of home, on the most liberal scale, for the modest consideration of £18 or £20 per annum. Even if this be an exaggeration, it is manifest that the condition of middle-class education is unsatisfactory and inadequate to the demand; so manifest, indeed, that the subject has been actually taken up by the thinking part of the community, and has so impressed itself on the mind of the Government that a Commission is about to be issued to examine into the exact state of scholastic instruction in this particular sphere of education. Such an inquiry cannot but be beneficial; and the very fact of its having been proposed has already vivified the occupants of the sphere into which its operations will extend. Much has already occurred which is calculated to excite hopes of an approaching reform which will render middle-class education the best in the country. Numerous clergymen, statesmen, the Universities, as bodies, are rapidly combining to help in this good work. At this critical moment it is satisfactory to have had very recently placed on record the opinion of that Minister of the State in whose hands the supervision of education is technically reposed.

In the opinion of that Minister there should be inspection and, if possible, examinations of middle-class schools; and an attempt should be made to base them upon a plan which should as far as possible, be systematic; but he distinctly disavows any notion that recourse should be had to pecuniary aid until every other method had been tried in vain. This is equivalent to an opinion that recourse need never be had to the State at all. Given a plan, a system, which is to be held up only as a guide and an exemplar: and the will and the means for the proper training of their children, an object strongly desired by them, will not be wanting in our sturdy and self-reliant middle class. They may be deficient in originality of design for such a purpose; but, the way once pointed out to them, they will treat it steadily, in the full confidence of their own power of action. The case is fundamentally different from that of what we call the "lower class." The reason why help is given by the State to the schools of the labouring classes, and the status of each institution precisely laid down, is that the parents of the scholars have not the means or the knowledge of doing what is required for their children: and that deficiency is the only legitimate excuse for the assumption of the task by the State. But the members of the middle class have the means, and are only partially deficient in the knowledge and the concert and combination necessary for procuring the good education for their children which they require; and hence the waste of money which is now prevalent on admittedly ineffectual schooling. It is true that there are amongst the middle class some admirable schools, which show what may be done without organised dictation or aid from the State. This is a proof that it only needs that the true condition of the case should be placed before the middle class, its resources and the abuses of those resources brought within its perception, and the best examples and the most special warnings in relation to education exhibited to its understanding, to induce that class to take the required reform into its own hands. It only needs the impulse to be given and judicious guidance to be afforded to enable this class to do a great work and to supply for itself a great blessing. If, however, these who are, much to their credit, placing themselves at the head of the movement in this direction which has begun should attempt to propose a system modelled on that which has been applied to the instruction of children whose parents are disqualified as a class by ignorance, poverty, and traditional habits of dependence to perform their educational duty towards them, it is no rash prophecy to predict that the issue will be a failure. If statesmen, legislators, political economists, and men of learning, in combination with the Government, will give their aid to systematise, in methodical fashion, middle-class education, they will be performing a task which will be acceptable to those for whose benefit they are working, and do much towards the end which is in view. But any scheme which may be based on the principle of a compulsory course or method of instruction and supervision by, even if it originate in and take shape by the Legislature, would be wholly efficacious and inoperative, for the simple reason that it would not be endured by the persons for whose behoof it was designed.

THE MONUMENT TO SIR GEORGE CORNEWALL LEWIS AT NEW RADNOR.

THE inauguration of a monument to the late Sir George Cornewall Lewis, in the town of New Radnor, in which neighbourhood the country seat of Harpton Court is situated, took place on Wednesday week. The Engraving on our front page, from a photograph by Mr. Bevan, of Kington, Herefordshire, represents the structure which has been erected on a triangular grassplot at the junction of three high roads, and in the centre of the principal business quarter of the town. It had been originally intended that the site of the monument should be on a mound, called the Castle Hill, which overlooks the town; but the workmen, in digging there for a foundation, came upon the ruins of Old Radnor Castle, with which it was considered by the Rev. Thomas Lewis, the incumbent, and by Mr. John Gibbs, of Oxford, who is likewise the architect of the memorial, and engineered a simple bridge that it is proposed to Abingdon, and of that to Shakspeare at Stratford-on-Avon. From his design, and under his superintendence, the monument at New Radnor has been constructed by Mr. Mundell. It is raised on a base, after the fashion of the Eleanor Cross, and is built mainly of Bay Island stone, from the Isle of Wight, and has in width at the base, and is octagonal in form. It comprises three distinct stages. On the front next the base is the following inscription:—"In memory of the Right Hon. George Cornewall Lewis, Baronet, M.P. Died 1863." Under this inscription there is a medallion portrait, in marble, of the late Privy Councillor, in the costume he wore, as above, is, in front and by eight columns, stand, under richly-carved canopies, four allegorical figures, viz., Truth, Eloquence, Learning, and Justice, Truth, as in Literature. The next stage consists of red Mansfield stone, placed round an octagonal shaft, and decorated with the coats of arms of England, Wales, Scotland, and Ireland, surmounted by a crown of four large griffins grasping the arms of the Lewis family. An ornamental pedestal, forming the last stage, and of the same stone as the carved cross with a circle entwined in its centre, terminates the structure, the general effect of which will be best conveyed by the accompanying sketch; and the foliage and other carving by Mr. W. Stevens, of Oxford, and Mr. Lynch, of Dublin. They are all very suitable.

The ceremony was simple and impressive. On a platform, sheltered from the rainy weather by a large tent, were Sir John Walsh, Bart., Lord Lieutenant, and Mr. G. Hugh, the High Sheriff of Herefordshire; the Earl of Clarendon; Mr. R. G. Price, M.P.; the Bishop of St. David's, the Rev. Sir George Lewis, Bart., Mr. Vernon Harcourt, and others. The Rev. L. Venables (chairman of the committee of subscribers) announced the completion of the work; Sir J. A regiment of the French expeditionary army has arrived at Lisbon on its way home from Mexico.

ITALY.

The debate on the Franco-Italian Convention is still proceeding in the Chamber of Deputies, and on Wednesday week a question to the Minister of the Interior said the temporal power of the Pope was not necessary to the splendour and independence of the spiritual power, and that the solution of the question was to be found in the principle of a free Church in a free State. Intervention was absurd, and the Convention only had an interest against a flagrant foreign aggression to uphold the temporal power, yet, in the event of a movement breaking out in the Papal States, the Italian Army must under engagement to repress it. These remarks were received with great applause by the Chamber. On another question the Prime Minister said that the conveyance of Venice was merely a matter of vanity on the part of Austria, and that Germany could not believe the Queen of the Adriatic was necessary to her existence. The Minister denied that France coveted any portion of Italian territory. In Tuesday's sitting General Cialdini supported the transfer of the capital on military grounds, and declared that between Austria and Italy no compromise is possible. The passes of the Apennines he described as capable of being made in case of need the genuine Thermopylæ of Italy. His declarations against Austria were received with loud applause. General La Marmora endorsed the sentiments of his military colleague. The Marquis Pallavacino, an old friend of Garibaldi, opposed the Convention, and declared himself in favour of going to Rome at all risks, and making war upon Austria for Venice. Signor Revel extolled the Convention from other motives, and considered the independence of the Pontifical temporal power necessary. In Wednesday's sitting Signor Galliani said the Convention ought to be accepted, notwithstanding its origin. The transfer of the capital was necessary, but it ought to be effected gradually.

The Official Gazette of Turin publishes a fresh list of ninety-eight communes which have offered to pay the land tax for 1865 in advance, and also a list of eighteen municipal juntas, provincial councils, and private individuals who have made a similar offer.

The Pungolo of Naples announces that the papal chief Schiavone, the terror of the Capitanate, has been captured, with five of his men.

AUSTRIA.

The Lower House of the Reichsrath has concluded its debate on the address to the Throne. The draught of the address was adopted, and was sent to the Emperor in writing. The address is liberal and progressive in many of its expressions, and shows a decided tendency towards conciliation within the empire and peaceful relations abroad. The Chamber have adopted a paragraph in their address to the Throne calling for an official statement of the causes and the results of the state of siege existing in Galicia. This paragraph was adopted despite the strenuous resistance of the Ministers.

The attempted rising in Friuli has been so far suppressed that the Government has issued a decree abolishing martial law in the district.

DENMARK AND GERMANY.

The King of Denmark continues his journey to Jutland, and we learn that, on account of the prohibition of the German Commissaries in Schleswig, a number of Schleswigers have gone to Koldding to pay their respects to King Christian and to assert their Danish nationality.

In Monday's sitting of the Frankfort Diet the Austro-Prussian proposition for the evacuation of Holstein and Lauenburg by the federal troops was carried by 10 votes against 6. Saxony, Hanover, Wurtemberg, and Darmstadt voted with the minority. The representatives of Austria and Prussia then intimated that the Commissioners of the two Powers in Schleswig would likewise undertake the administration of Holstein and Lauenburg. We may therefore regard the affair, which has given us so much uneasiness, as at an end.

The Prussian troops who have returned from the scene of the late war entered Berlin on Wednesday, with the King at their head, amid an immense and enthusiastic crowd.

RUSSIA.

Winter seems to have commenced in earnest in Russia. A letter from Cronstadt of the 23rd ult. states that the sea was then frozen there as far as the eye could reach. Several merchant-vessels, with full cargoes, were ice-bound.

An Imperial ukase has been issued ordering the Senate to promulgate the Code of Laws relative to the manner of the exercise of justice, the new penal code, and the laws upon the procedure in civil and criminal affairs, and the powers of justices of the peace; all these laws having received the Imperial sanction.

It is asserted that a new internal lottery loan of one hundred millions of roubles will be issued in January next, to provide for the construction of railways in Russia.

The celebrated Russian astronomer Frederic Struve, whose name is associated with all the great works of triangulation and geodesy carried out in Russia and Eastern Europe, died on the 23rd ult. at St. Petersburg, in the 76th year of his age. (Struve, Otto Wilhelm.)

The Emperor has issued a ukase extending the abolition of serfdom to Transcaucasia, the only portion of the Russian empire where that institution still exists.

GREECE.

The King has taken the oath to the new Constitution; and the National Assembly, having finished at last its long-protracted labours, has been dissolved.

AMERICA.

By the Peruvian and the City of London we have New York dispatches to the 26th and 27th ult.

General Sherman is making his way through the heart of Georgia, laying waste the country as he goes, and destroying railroads. There is, however, little as yet positively known as to his movements, and there is no certainty as to the point at which he is aiming. It seems as if he were making a direction of his march for Savannah or Beaufort Gordon. He appears to have extended his army along a wide extent of country, and his left and centre have been through which he passed. There was a report that he had captured Macon, but this is not confirmed. On the contrary, at the last accounts, the Confederate General Wheeler with his cavalry was said to be disputing the advance of Sherman's column on that place. General Beauregard had also, it was said, moved that he would be able to aid in repelling the invader, and he requested the people to destroy everything before them that could be of use to the enemy, and of which Georgian representatives had also telegraphed a similar request. Meantime, the militia were mustering in all directions, and orders had been given that the local forces of North and South Carolina should go beyond the borders of their own States to assist in repelling the invasion. Blood was progressing rapidly in Tennessee. He was advancing on Pulaski, from which General Hood was retreating, making for Columbia, where an engagement was expected. Thus we have the remarkable spectacle of a Federal General making his way by fire and sword through the rich cotton State of Georgia, and of a Confederate General so lately opposed to him carrying at the same time the war northwards.

At Petersburg no active movement had taken place; but the Confederates were reported to be mining under General Lee's lines. A late Federal reconnaissance in the Shenandoah Valley Early was found in strong force at Rood's Hill.

President Lincoln has issued a proclamation announcing that the blockade of the ports of Norfolk, Virginia, and Pensacola and Pascagoula, Florida, would be closed on Dec. 1, when those ports would be opened to commerce, excluding only articles contraband of war.

The exchange of prisoners was still in progress at Savannah. At last accounts about 4000 had been exchanged.

The Hon. Reuben E. Fenton, Governor Elect of the State of New York, in a message to the Legislature at that State, has said that hereafter the State should occupy no hesitating or equivocal position. The issue presented to the people, he said, was whether they would maintain the Government in its integrity, or whether the advantages gained over the Confederates should be surrendered, thus whatever helping the rebellion, and failing to maintain the contest, and becoming the laughing-stock and derision of mankind.

It is reported that Mr. Buchanan Lord Lyons has almost recovered from his recent illness.

An attempt was, we are told, made on the night of the 25th ult., to set fire simultaneously to a number of the great hotels, theatres, and public buildings of New York; but it is added that little damage was done. Four of the alleged incendiaries were apprehended, and it was supposed that Confederate emissaries were connected with the affair.

The latest quotation of gold at New York was 172½ per cent premium. The Canadian authorities, it is said, had the greatest difficulty in detecting munitions of war at various points, had prohibited the exportation of arms.

INDIA.

The Viceroy of India, Sir John Lawrence, returned to Calcutta on Nov. 1 from his successful visit to the north of the Empire.

The insurrection at the British force into Bhootan was to take place about the middle of this month.

The subscriptions in Bombay towards the cyclone relief fund at Calcutta had reached the amount of £20,000.

He contended, in opposition to Mr. Colobn, that the large expenditure of late years on the defences of the country had spared from repairs of Mr. James Wyllie, the United States secretary of the navy, to prove this. Finally, he defended the Admiralty against charges which had been made against them. A vote of confidence in the noble Lord was passed.

Loud Stanley distributed prizes and certificates of merit yesterday week to the successful pupils of the Manchester Mechanics' institution. Mr. Oliver Heywood, the president of the institute, occupied the chair. Mr. Heywood, in the course of a suggestive address, reviewed the history of mechanics' institutes, their use, vicissitudes, and present position, and then spoke of their relation to the general education of the people at the present time. He protested against the practice of overworking children in schools, observing that the mind ought to be developed to a young subject, intellectually and bodily, to keep it learning, or pretending to learn, the greater part of the day. Three or four hours' study a day was long enough for any child. His Lordship also pointed out the advantage of keeping educational institutions free from party politics and from sectarian feeling. Prizes as regards the Government prizes which he had just been distributing, he believed they would be as well or better without them.

The French and Papal Governments have just concluded a telegraphic treaty. A quire message has been despatched from Paris to Rome, and vice versa, will cost only 5f., instead of 15f. 90c.

THE FUTURE OF THE JAPANESE BATTERIES AT SIMONOSAKI.

We have received from Mr. C. Wirgman, our Special Artist and Correspondent with the allied squadron lately engaged in the Straits of Simonoseki, a letter giving details of the conflict of the 5th and 6th of September, two sketches of which were engraved and published in our Journal three weeks ago. In this letter Mr. C. Wirgman represents the banding-party of sailors and marines advancing to the attack of the forts, which he was described in the former narrative of this affair. This took place about six o'clock in the evening of the second day. The Japanese had posted two or three of their heavy guns behind a low stockade commanding the lines which covered the top of the hill where the huts or barracks of their soldiery and their principal quantities of ammunition were situated. From this sheltered position they had kept up an annoying fire upon the advancing force, but the gunboats were now engaged during the afternoon in removing the guns from the other batteries close to the shore. Captain Alexander, of the Euryalus, with a few hundred men from that ship and the Conqueror, proceeded at length to the attack of the masked battery, hastily crossing a paddy-field, which was exposed to the fire of the enemy's musketry, and which luckily wounded twice to the front of the stockade. Several of our men were killed and many more injured, but Captain Alexander himself was severely wounded in the foot, after which the command was taken by Lieutenant Suther, of the Royal Marines. The Japanese, however, did not wait for their approach, but from the rear firing of our guns from behind the trees, set fire to the huts and ran away into the forest, where they could not be followed. It is said that the troops were much surprised to find that our seamen were able to fight on land.

PEYTON FALLS IN VIRGINIA.

We have engraved on another page a sketch, by an amateur artist, of Peyton Falls, in the Alleghany Mountains, Western Virginia. This romantic and picturesque cascade is in Augusta County, which is subentay to Jackson's River. It is situated in the district or township which was once known as West Augusta, a place remarkable for the courage and patriotism of its inhabitants. This is the place to which Washington referred when he said, in the darkest days of the American Revolution, "Give me but a banner, and I will plant it upon the mountains of West Augusta, and rally around me the men who will raise our liberties higher than the top of the Blue Ridge." It was around Jackson, the boys of the present unhappy civil war, as well as many others of his immortal brigade, was a native of this district. It was near Peyton Falls that Stonewall Jackson had his last battle with the enemy—that of Rich Mountain, in which fell Colonel R. S. Garnett and Colonel John A. Washington. Peyton Falls is the highest cascade or waterfall in America, being 200 ft. in height, while that of Niagara is only 150 ft. The principal stream, however, is only about 10 yards wide at the top and a little more spread at the bottom of the fall. The water is bright and sparkling, and the stream in other parts is full of trout. Near the cascade there is a mineral spring of rare curative properties

PEYTON FALLS, ALLEGHANY COUNTY, VIRGINIA.

SPORT IN THE FORESTS OF BRAZIL.

Our Illustration represents a scene which may be recognised by the traveller who has chanced to spend a few days in the pursuit of game in the Brazilian forests. The place where the sketch was made is a favourite haunt of the deer which resort to the banks of one of the small mountain streams near Petropolis. When a party of sportsmen arrive at this spot, their dogs are put into the woods to rouse the deer, which, when disturbed, generally follow the course of the nearest stream. The rifleman hides himself behind a rock, and patiently awaits the approach of the deer. It must be confessed, however, that his patience is too often not rewarded with a single shot. In general, shooting in the Brazilian woods is not a very exciting sport. There are various sorts of fine game birds; but, owing to the immense size of the forest, it is impossible to get at them, except by waiting under certain trees, upon the berries of which the birds are accustomed to feed. Moreover, in all his sylvan excursions in Brazil the sportsman is obliged to keep a very sharp look out for snakes. So that, except for the adventurous novelty of the situation, one might prefer to take one's pleasure on a Scottish moor.

SELECT MEDICAL OPINIONS.

The late Dr. JONATHAN PEREIRA, F.R.S., Physician to the Hospital for Consumption, &c.

"It was fitting that the author of the best analysis and investigations into the properties of Cod-liver Oil should be the first to introduce to the profession a preparation of it considered with reference to colour, flavour, or chemical properties, less satisfied that, as hitherto prepared, it is a nauseous drug."

DR. EDWARD SMITH, F.R.S.

Physician to the Hospital for Consumption and Diseases of the Chest, Brompton, &c., &c.

"We think it a great advantage that there is one kind of Cod-liver Oil which is not only unobjectionable to the palate, but actually pleasant to take. We find that it has long been borne by patients who could not take the ordinary Cod-liver Oil, and, moreover, enabled an much earlier and more satisfactory use, have confidence in its genuineness."—Extract from "Consumption, its Nature and Treatment," &c.

DR. LANKESTER, F.R.S.,

Coroner for Central Middlesex, &c., &c.

"I consider that the purity and genuineness of this Oil are secured in the preparation by the process of filtration through animal charcoal, which I have seen carried out."

DR. DE JONGH, who has also written the best Medical Treatise on the Oil with which I am acquainted, Result: Dr. Dujardin Beaumetz has found the Pale Oil sold by Ansar, Harford, and Co. to possess the properties to a remarkable degree."

LEITHEBY

Medical Officer of Health, and Chief Analyst to the city of London, &c., &c.

"I have found the Pale Oil sold by Ansar, Harford, and Co. genuine, pure, and uncontaminated by the nauseous flavour and properties of the Brown Oil, and have personally acknowledged that Dr. de Jongh's Light-brown Cod-liver Oil was procured from the finest and freshest livers. I have no doubt of the being a pure and unadulterated article."

Senior Physician to the Hospital, &c., &c.

"I have frequently recommended persons commencing twice to make use of Dr. Joysun's Cod-liver Oil. I have been well satisfied with its effects, and believe it to be a very pure Oil, well fitted for those cases in which the use of that substance is indicated."

EDWIN CANTON, M.D., F.R.S.,

Surgeon to Charing-cross Hospital, &c., &c.

"For several years past I have been in the habit of prescribing DR. DE JONGH'S Light-brown Cod-liver Oil, and find it to be much more efficacious than any other varieties of Cod-liver Oil which I have tried, and I have no hesitation in stating that it is the purest and best Oil I have ever used."

DR. DE JONGH'S LIGHT-BROWN COD-LIVER OIL is sold only in capsuled IMPERIAL HALF-PINTS, bearing the Stamp and Signature of the Consulting Physician to the Hospital, without WHICH NONE CAN POSSIBLY BE GENUINE, by respectable Chemists and

This company is formed for the purpose of meeting in the city of London a public section much in the want of facilities for the transaction of business in the Auction Mart, and which, from the increased value of property in the Baltic-house district, City, having been concerted to other purposes and the insufficient accommodation afforded by the Auction Mart.

The Directors have secured, on favourable terms, an extensive freehold site in Tokenhouse-yard, next to the offices of the Bank of London, and within a few minutes' walk of the Royal Exchange. The site is about 100 feet in length, and has a frontage of 50 feet, extending from the present position—being close to the Bank of England, the Joint-stock Banks, Mercers' Hall, and the Stock Exchange—to Lothbury, and immediately opposite Messrs. Rivington's publishing premises. The great advantage it possesses in being free from the noise and disturbance of a leading thoroughfare.

The Directors have had plans prepared by Mr. Somers Clarke, a gentleman and substantial buildings, containing on the ground and first floors several large and well-lighted rooms, with every convenience for the transaction of business by auction, and for the reception of goods intended for sale; with a separate entrance and staircase, numerous rooms and offices for clerks, and other requisites for the due conduct of business, and numerous rooms for the accommodation of private parties, and for the purchaser accommodation and additional

The Architect has also prepared a register of the prices at which the Auction Mart, or the Auctioneers of the present Mart, have sold. In which shareholders will have a premium payment of 5 per cent. on the amount of their shares allotted to them, and a further payment of 5 per cent. at the end of every twelve months, for the space of three years, and 2½ per cent. for the next two years, making in all 20 per cent. on the number of shares applied for, and upon allotment, to make a further payment of 5 per shares allotted to him. The remaining £15 per share to be paid by calls at such times as the requirements of the company demand.

Applications for shares and deposits will be received in full.

Prospectuses may be obtained at the Offices of the Company, and of the Solicitors, or of the Secretary, at the temporary offices, 62, Old Broad-street, E.C.

is invariably pure, pleasant, efficacious, and easily taken. Universally recognised to be incomparably superior to every other kind.

DISEASES OF THE LUNGS AND CHEST.

The extraordinary efficacy of this unrivalled remedy in Pulmonary Consumption, and other affections of the Chest, is proved by the rapidity with which the exhausted strength improves the nutritive functions, and appetite, digestion, and sleep are restored. Its health-giving and reparative properties are shown in more marked and favourable influence on the local malady. DR. MARSDEN, late Physician to the Consumption Hospital, Brompton, says: "Of the action of Dr. de Jongh's Light-brown Cod-liver Oil, in the cases of Consumption which I have had under my care, I have no hesitation in stating that it is more efficacious than any other variety of Cod-liver Oil which I have tried, and I have no hesitation in stating that it is the purest and best Oil I have ever used." Dr. Dujardin Beaumetz has found the Pale Oil sold by Ansar, Harford, and Co. to possess the properties to a remarkable degree."

DR. DE JONGH'S LIGHT-BROWN COD-LIVER OIL is sold only in capsuled IMPERIAL HALF-PINTS, bearing the Stamp and Signature of the Consulting Physician to the Hospital, without WHICH NONE CAN POSSIBLY BE GENUINE, by respectable Chemists and

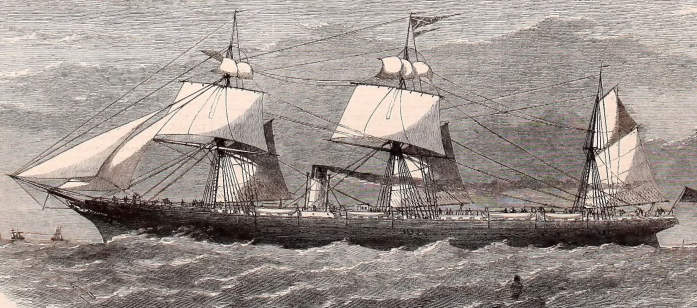
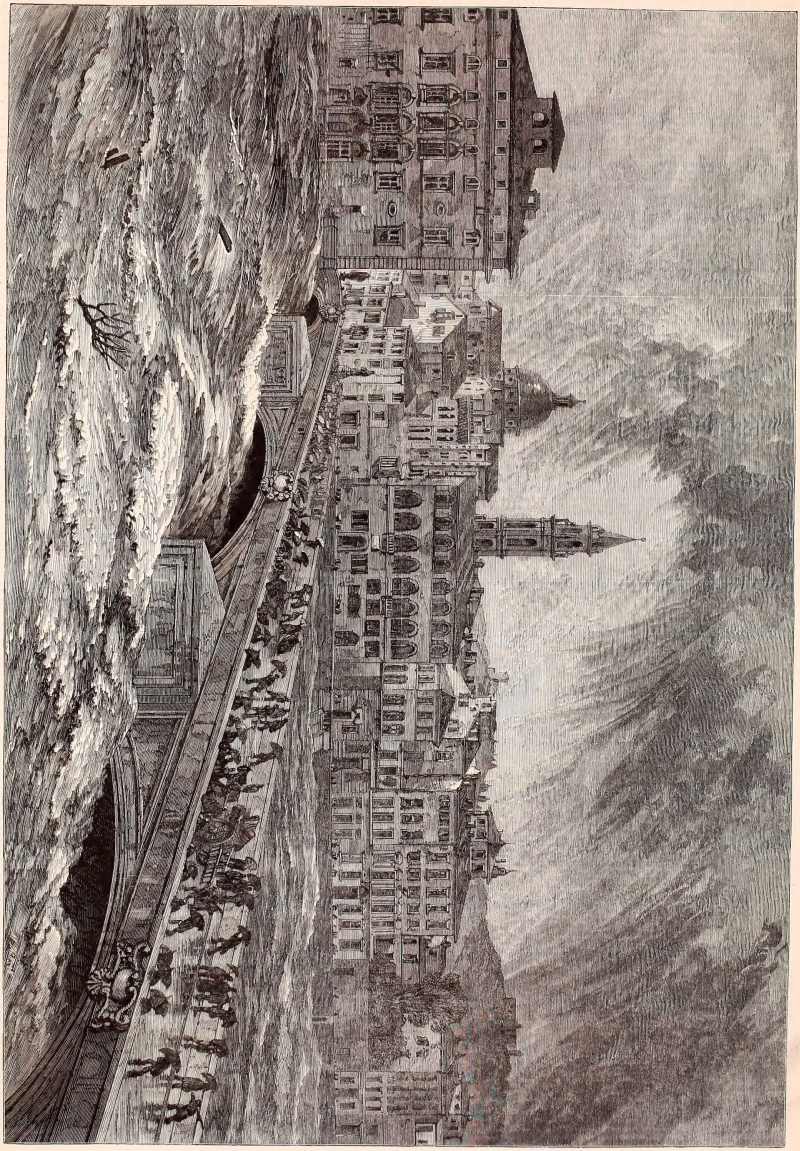
DAVID ROBERTS, R.A.

WHENEVER the story of David Roberts's life shall be written, it will be found to have great and varied interest, in addition to that which attaches to his works. The artist himself has left many journals and diaries of his eventful life and extensive travels; and these invaluable materials for the biographer are said to abound with personal anecdotes of adventures and of the many distinguished persons whom he met. Then the facts of his earlier life disclose a most striking instance of "self-help." Among the large proportion of self-made artists of all ages a prominent place will always be assigned to the man who from a poor journeyman house-painter ("decorative," if you will) became a Royal Academician and achieved a European reputation. And all this was done without adventitious aid of any kind. David Roberts never had, as he himself averred, help or instruction from any teacher or professor; he had no academic education or scholastic leaning to aid in winning fame and position; no brilliant conversational parts or other accomplishments to attract and secure patronage and popularity. Yet he would have been the last person in the world to claim to be a "heaven-born genius" in art. He was simply an energetic, persevering, well-trying man, brave, honest, faithful. All honour to these self-made men! That may be a good man and true who, wafted by Prosperity and piloted by Fortune, has but to glide with the current into port; but he must be so who struggling against wind and tide, with, as it might seem, only a grim fate at the helm and a thick cloud at the prow, yet, through his own strong arm alone, makes the haven.

David Roberts was born at Stockbridge, Edinburgh, four years before the close of last century, and, as we have intimated, served an apprenticeship to a decorative house-painter. But even when a child little Davey had shown a fondness for drawing by sketching houses and landscapes on the walls at school and at home. Moreover, the decorator—Beugo by name—to whom he was articled seems to have been a man of talent, as we should infer from the fact that a second apprentice, who served along with Roberts, became afterwards distinguished. We allude to Mr. D. R. Hay, the well-known writer on the science of harmonies in colours and forms, and the practice of decorative art. Roberts must have studied art during his apprenticeship, for, towards the close of it, he painted a view of Abbotsford which Scott is said to have greatly admired. Soon after this, too, he obtained an engagement to paint scenes in the Edinburgh Theatre, and subsequently, we believe, for that of Glasgow also. Contrary to what has been asserted, the famous Trustees' Academy at Edinburgh cannot fairly claim the future R.A. among the number of her pupils who have risen to eminence. All he did there was to begin a drawing of a hand; but this beginning was so ungromising that he was dissuaded from proceeding further with the usual course of academic study from "the figure."



From Mr. Murray, the principal of the Edinburgh Theatre, Roberts got an introduction to Elliston, manager of Drury Lane Theatre; and, when only twenty-six, he became scene-painter at Drury Lane, and also, in the days of Macready, at Covent Garden, through which he became well known to the metropolitan public, as did also his firm friend—still spared to us—Clarkson Stanfield. Another friend of this early time was David's countryman, "Jock Wilson," the landscape-painter (of the Society of British Artists); and these, with other artist confrères, used, like Reynolds and his club, at the Turk's Head, in Greek-street, to meet nightly at a tavern just over Westminster Bridge. Later, when Roberts had won his associateship, he joined the choice spirits of the Garrick Club, and for many years, down to the last, was the acknowledged president of the smoking-room.



THE LATE DAVID ROBERTS, R.A.

In the practice of scene-painting Roberts acquired his skill in composition and light and shade, his extraordinary rapidity and command of hand, and that thorough knowledge of perspective, which, according to Mr. Ruskin, he alone among English artists, with the exception of Samuel Prout, possessed. Scene-painting is an art which demands rare ability, and is only depreciated by those who do not understand its exigencies and who forget that it has been practised by such men as Salvator Rosa, Canaletto, Inigo Jones (who first introduced into England appropriate scenic decorations to the Royal masques), Loutherbourg, Pugin, and the illustrious pair, Roberts and Stanfield. Nor must we exclude from the rank of distinguished artists such men as Burford, Beverley, Telbin Grieve and Farrie.

Wonderful stories are told of Roberts having executed the whole scenery for "wings" and "flats" to compose some magnificent spectacle within a few hours of the time it was to be shown to the public. For the entertainment, called "At Home," of his friend Charles Mathews the elder, Roberts is said to have painted the scenery and to have invented a new and surprising effective arrangement of picture and performer. As from house-decoration to scene-painting in distemper, so from the latter to sketching in water-colours, the step is not great. It was not long before, through the medium of engravings and owing to their foreign subjects, the sketches of Roberts extended his reputation, beyond England, to the Continent. One of the most eloquent passages ever written by Thackeray was penned in praise of Roberts' sketches. When, however, the scene-painter sets himself to produce finished pictures in oil which are to be leisurely and critically examined under wholly new conditions, we may naturally expect to find some superficiality and license of various kinds; yet, whatever we may think of some later works, nothing of the kind is to be found in Roberts's earlier pictures—as, for example, those in the Sheepshanks Collection. We do not know the precise time when the artist finally laid aside the pound-brush, the whitewash-pail, and kettle of hot size. Though his name appears in the Royal Academy catalogue as early as 1826, he did not regularly contribute till several years later. Like Stanfield, Roberts was for some years a member of the Society of British Artists, and ultimately he became vice-president. His first celebrated picture was "The Departure of the Israelites from Egypt," engraved by Quilley, a direct competition with the style of John Martin. During some ten years from 1827 great part of his time was occupied travelling in France, the Netherlands, Germany, Italy Spain, and filling portfolios which supplied the illustrations of the "Landscape Annual," the "Pilgrims of the Rhine," by Sir Edward Bulwer Lytton; the Spain (with the tints just then invented) &c.; and from which he painted innumerable architectural views, interiors and exteriors, ecclesiastical and secular. Having paid the fee for detaching himself from the Society of British Artists, he was elected A.R.A. in 1838, and in the autumn of that year started on a tour in the East, during which he took hundreds of sketches—for the most part executed in pencil, but often with the addition of a few washes of water colour. Nearly two hundred and fifty of these were lithographed by Mr. Louis Haghe, and, accompanied by eloquent descriptions by Dr. Croly, were published by Moon in four quarto volumes, as "Sketches in the Holy Land, Syria, Idumea, Arabia, Egypt, and Nubia." The artist received £3000 for the copyright, and the popularity of this splendid work abroad as well as at home was remarkable. Much of this was doubtless due to the comparatively novel interest of the subjects; for twenty-five years ago the facilities of travelling anywhere, but especially in the East, were not what they are now. The sketches taken in this tour went to the common stock of subjects for future pictures; but a special and memorable utilisation of the visit to Jerusalem appeared in 1849, as the large and highly popular picture of the "Destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans." In 1841 Roberts was elected R.A. From the time when the artist received a commission for the memorial picture of the "Inauguration of the Great Exhibition of 1851," At intervals, during the last years, the painter was engaged upon a series of pictures of London for Mr. Lucas, the contractor. He had been working on one of these, representing St. Paul's from Ludgate Hill, on the morning of the day (the 25th ult.) on which he died. He left his residence, 7, Fitzroy-street, somewhat unwell, as was his wont, in order to visit a friend, Mr. Wad. R.A., at the French Gallery, Pallmall, to consider the award of the prizes offered to contributors to the Winter Exhibition at that gallery. In the afternoon of the day the gentlemen were asked to assist. While walking in Berners-street he sweetened with apology, and to those who rise to his assistance could only utter the words, "Fitzroy-street—take me home." After this he became perfectly insensible till he expired, at seven o'clock the same evening. He was buried at Mr. Chubb's cemetery, on the 2nd inst., in private manner, in accordance with his wish.

The artist left behind him, besides his journals, a kind of "Liber Veritatis" similar to that of Claude—i.e., two quarto volumes, containing some 250 pen-and-ink sketches of, probably, all the principal pictures he painted, with written descriptive, and other particulars, the whole very methodically arranged.

Mr. Roberts married early in his life, a lady of great beauty, was the model of Mary Queen of Scots in Sir William Allan's celebrated picture of the landing of that unfortunate Queen at Leith. Her career lost one daughter, who married the son of Mr. Bicknell, the noted collector, whose pictures were sold at Christie's last year.

We have only space to add that Mr. Roberts was a wee-president of the Artists' Benevolent Fund; and his kind-heartedness might be exemplified in many stories of his liberality—as the Scotch say, fortunate brethren of the bush. Nor did he ever forget or disown his early connection with the Drama. As one proof, for theatrical artists who have been excited in connection with the Royal Dramatic College at Maybury by the munificence of Clarkson Stanfield, so another has been by a second Royal Academician and contributor, David Roberts.

The Portrait we have engraved is from a photograph by Mason, 3, and C. Watkins, of Parliament-street.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

The Metropolitan Board of Works have directed £15,652 to be paid for the purchase of the land for Finsbury Park.

The Guards of the Universities College Hospital have been erected to £375, portion of a bequest made by the late Mr. Grote, for the benefit of the poor in London.

Between Saturday night and Monday morning the strongroom of Messrs. Baum, bullion dealers, Lombard-street, was entered by thieves, who carried off coin and notes to the amount of £2,000.

At the weekly meeting of the City Court of Sewers on Tuesday Dr. Letheby reported that 265 houses had been inspected during the week, and he submitted twenty-eight plans for the improvement of them. Fifty officers had condemned 2920 lb. of meat as unfit for human food, most of which was in a diseased condition.

The fifth annual ball for the benefit of the Dramatic College took place on Wednesday at St. James's Hall. Fitzroy-street has been removed for the night to make way for the dancers. A very large and brilliant company attended, and the arrangements were well planned and well carried out by the energetic ball committee.

The new ride in St. James's Park, for the exclusive use of equestrians with the exception of the Sovereign and members of the Royal family, will not be permitted—was completed on Tuesday. The ride extends from the edge of Birdcage Walk, Queen-square, Westminster, to the Bird-cage Pimlico. It will be opened to the public on Saturday (to-day).

At a Board which took place at the Mansion House on Monday morning great courage was shown by Fire-escape Conductor Miller, who brought several members of a family out of one of the flames. Some articles of value were left behind, he rushed back and snatched him from his bed, but became so exhausted from the heat and suffocating smoke, and would have perished had not a brother conductor come to his assistance.

Yesterday week a meeting was held at the Horns, Kennington Park, to protest that the hitherto open-to-all character of the park should be interfered with. Mr. Samuel Morley occupied the chair. Several speeches were made, and resolutions to oppose the proposed change were passed. A similar meeting was held the same night in the Hatfield-street school-room, Commercial-road. Mr. Alderman Lusk in the chair. Resolutions against the new the formation of such a club were passed.

Mr. Lopes addressed a meeting of his constituents at the Bridge House Hotel yesterday week. He reviewed the proceedings of the last Session of Parliament, dwelling especially on the subject of the privy council. A vote of confidence in the hon. gentleman was passed.—Mr. Locke, M.P., addressed his constituents at the Bridge House Hotel on Saturday evening. A large portion of his address was made up of allusions to local topics. He particularly urged the desirability of consolidating the City and Metropolitan parishes into one union, with the object of equalising the poor rate. He received a vote of confidence.

Last week the births of 1963 children—1016 boys and 947 girls—were registered in London. In the ten corresponding weeks of the years 1865-74 the average number (corrected) was 1,906. The mortality of London is still high, though the deaths returned for the week that ended on Saturday—namely, 1634, are not quite so numerous as in the previous week, and are less by 118 than the number in the week that ended Nov. 19. The average number of deaths in the forty-eight weeks of the years 1865-74 is, with a correction for increase of population, 1348. The number registered is in excess of the estimated number by 286. Of the deaths registered last week in the most fatal of the zymotic diseases, and 103 cases of it are recorded in the week. Eighty-three deaths were referred to typhus, being two above the last 10 cases, differing not widely in number from those of the two previous weeks. Diarrhœa was fatal in 122 cases. Deaths from bronchitis, pneumonia, and pleurisy were numerous recently. Six deaths of meningoencephalitis were registered. In still, rapid years, was attributed by a local jury to "a head kick from a horse."

LAW AND POLICE.—The Lord Chancellor has reversed the decision of Vice-Chancellor Wood, by which it was decided that a sum of £10,000 left by the Viscountess Falkland to the Society for the Relief of Widows and Orphans of Medical Men for the purpose of erecting daughter-houses was not void by the Statute of Mortmain.

In the Court of Queen's Bench, last week, Blake, an attorney who had been suspended from practice, brought an action for conspiracy against Lord and others, solicitor of a body called "the Law Relating to Attorneys," for stating by implication that he had been struck off the rolls. The jury, finding for the plaintiff, awarded him £500.—This was a mistake which might have been dealt with in a different spirit. If Blake had been struck off the rolls before he brought the action he would have had the case dismissed, and had humiliate the plaintiff by the stinging observation that he must not or not a course for persons to pretend to be what they were not. The jury should be taken into consideration by the jury in estimating the damages. The next Scotsman had not rise to the dignity of a martyr, and the proper act that he should be trampled in the dust." The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff—damages, £500.

The long-postponed trial of Mr. Romaine, Inspector of Machinery at the Royal Dockyard, Sheerness, on a charge of conspiracy with Messrs. Cox, the Faversham ship Rappahannock, came on before the Court of Queen's Bench on Monday. At the close of the day's proceedings it was discovered that the material witnesses, officers in the Navy, were absent in the Mediterranean, so the case was postponed sine die.

A young man named Carr, whose hand was severely bitten by a Russian blood-hound during a recent dog show at the Agricultural Hall, sued the company to which the hall belongs for damages in the Court of Common Pleas last week. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff—damages, £100 and costs.

The charges against Mr. Arthur Bostin Wilkinham for obtaining jewellery under false pretence have been withdrawn.

The Home Secretary has decided that Matthews, the coalman, is entitled to the whole of the reward for the apprehension and conviction of Wallace. The sum is £200. Meanwhile, Matthews has been arrested by one of his creditors, and it is expected that claims for at least £500 will be lodged against him, so that the reward will speedily be swallowed up.

New editions, corrected to the latest period, of "Bradshaw's Handbooks to the three Presidencies of India" have recently been published. These three compact volumes form through route and descriptive guides, by road, river, and railway, to the Presidency of Bengal and the Bengal Provinces, that of Madras and the Central Provinces, and to the Bombay Presidency and the Bombay West Provinces. They are provided with maps and town plans, and are brimful of useful and curious information with one

ECHOES OF THE WEEK.

THE pens which will this week create far more interest than those of supercilious dramatists or novelists, whose works run into six editions in as many weeks, with those of that fat cattle in the Smithfield Club Cattle Show. Baker-street is deserted, but the Agricultural Hall, vast as it is, flows over with human beings, and the fresh air is hardly to hounds before feeding-time and as ruddy as gamecocks in their countenances, though, by-the-way, not half so sanguine. What can be said new about a cattle show? Who is the interesting individual who reverts the triumphs of Mr. John Overman over sheep and oxen? Who writes so learnedly of "Shorthorns," "Black faces, speckled faces, and white faces" of the old-fashioned mountain sort, and of sheep with shaggy fleeces of the heavy quality? Upon all these our readers, as company with the present writer, must content themselves with a certain indifference—happy in knowing that the efforts of our farmers not only provide for our own table, but for that in the world, but also that our wool is getting every day better, that foreign farmers find it worth their while to send their sheep here, and that, like Swift's great public benefactor, they not only succeed in making two blades of grass grow where only one grew before, but three, and cultivate at least four legs of mutton upon the space which served our ancestors for one.

Of course no unusual influx of visitors to the theatres has accompanied the cattle show. Drury Lane has been crammed, and other theatres have had a good harvest, if we take into consideration the size of the houses. At Drury Lane, during each night this week, there has been an address spoken in aid of the Working Men's Shakspeare Movement, a movement of considerable importance, which will endeavour successfully to carry out that in which the national committee failed. Nothing can be more absurd than committees formed of individuals who are infinitely more obscure than those gentlemen—though we have no doubt they are quite as clever—who form the National seat out so liberally, but they evidently know how to go to work better than their more noted brethren, we will not call them rivals, in this kind of work.

As the great question of the disposal of our town sewage appears to be on the point of being solved, the Shakspeare question is also, and every present writer knows infinitely less than the gentleman who first wrote a courteous letter contradicting all his statements to-morrow, would it not be well to hold a large congress of the Social Society during the stay of our farming friends in town? Would not some useful facts, based upon experience, be elicited? As a class, the farmers resemble, in one particular only, Mr. Colsden. They do not take in the Times, and therefore have no instruments by which, more confusedly, one may gather from the many admirable letters which are found in that journal. The second question which is angrily discussed is that of the water-supply. Is there more water than one "great metropolis" to quote Mr. Grant's title, can well bear. Is Parliament Hill Fields, or is it not, a reservoir of water? Is the Serpentine, or Hyde Park, with all the really beautiful gardens with which Mr. Cowper has adorned it? Where will the "devouring flend" traffic stop? Is there a limit to the number of loads, or tons, which will use upon the electric telegraph, under the earth and in the sky? Will nothing check it? Is there no limit to the number of cabs which are plying on pretty well, and notably when Holborn or Oxford-street has been recently and splendidly repaved, an obscure company, which may be a bubble or may turn out a success, has set on foot a scheme for many of navvies, form effectual barricades with a few overturned wheelbarrows or a fine cart, and thus, in a few hours, close the whole of the main road up ruthlessly our excellent streets. Then it is that quiet squares and leafy crescents, which have hitherto been inhabited by quiet gents, redolent of cigars and radiant with bright ties and neat collars, utter into first-floor windows or look down upon you as you are quietly basking in the sun, with a book in your hand, that at night, when in your "beauty sleep," you are awakened by the cries of "Here you are!" "Fresh fish!" "Fine fish!" "Fine mackerel!" and a festian jacket, and drawn by six thundering horses with iron hoofs as big as dinner-plates, or about five in the morning, too early even for the milkmen, and too late for the one to conscientiously slumber without a due remembrance of Dr. Watts's hymn, invade your peaceful abode. Is there no remedy for these things loosely together, like a cherry-clapper, flops down the street with a deafly beginning, and ends with a bang. Is there no remedy for it repeated, and you think piteously of the poor invalids it disturbs? Is there nothing to be done to remedy all this? Trade, of course, must be interfered with, but is there no way in which a remedy can be carried on in a less noisy way?

The Social Science Congress, five gentlemen, some on the press and others gathered from the different classes of society, witnessed an experiment which especially provided tests of the Davenport Brothers. The head of these gentlemen, Mr. Fitzgerald, in the first portion of this meeting, from which it would appear that the spiritualists were not quite so anxious to be left to themselves as the usual company of spectators. The gentlemen retired puzzled but not satisfied. The conclusion arrived at by the audience is—failing the brothers "sorry mountebanks" the did them great injustice. "I believe you to be," he continues, "the very cleverest conjurers whose performances I have ever witnessed." The experiment is worth a further notice after two performance on inspection. In the Morning Post, Captain Richard Burton has thrown out some curious hints on the Shakspeare question. Whilst suspending his belief, the great African traveller, who surely is sceptical enough on most points and who has seen most systems of belief, from Mormonism to Obeah, Voodooism to Fetishism, Islam to lamaism, seeing drops of fire from the ceiling, and beholding all manner of things which, if they do not exist, have certainly puzzled most of us. Mr. Hewitt, in a recently-published letter, proclaims his infirm belief in the spiritualism over the "spiritual appearance of a ribald press, to the writers on which he calls names—"Go, shovel gentlemen, and in a very short time you will have pilloried yourselves immortally in the pages of Shakspeare's unwritten story, west and railroads to the amplest satisfaction of your very worst readers."

The annual ball for the benefit of the Royal Dramatic College took place on Wednesday night, and, judging from its success—which, by-the-by, always attends Lord Lonsdale's efforts for the Theatrical Fund—at the Crystal Palace, the Royal Dramatic College bids fair to become one of the richest institutions in the country. Its claims are worthy in proportion, and in a much shorter time than did those of Allen's College at Dulwich it will be in a position to receive its pensioners.

We can answer for our own days, and also, perhaps, for those of our sons, but we can hardly answer for those who succeed them. How will they like the Christmas pantomimes, of course, the authors, performers, and managers will do their best to please everybody, but do they not do so every year, in spite of the fact that we never have the old fun we used to have, and that our clowns are doubtlessly inferior to their predecessors of past days. We are not sure that the place of Tom Matthews, let alone that of Grimaldi; but our clowns have always been popular, and if pleasing is the test they will be very beautiful. At Covent Garden also, the new company is making great efforts to produce something always attractive. Here are the smaller theatres a whit behind their larger competitors in the favour of the public. The great "Drame" at the Adelphi proves to be a decided success, in spite of the thrill of horror which some of its scenes cause. It is, perhaps, altogether much too thoroughly "French" to be very popular with us, but even if pleasing it is not. They may reckon that almost all the great "runs" have been gained by pieces in which English humour

Our Mutual Friend. By Charles Dickens. No. 8. The time has come to when Mr. Dickens's exuberant imagination yielded gold for the asking; it now has to be wrought carefully, and many veins, promising at first, suddenly prove poor and unprofitable. This has been evidently the case for the last two parts of this fiction, where we have Mr. Dickens exhausting himself in the effort to extract amusement from conceptions of extraordinary poverty because but the mere painfully apparent the longer they were manipulated. The present number presents a gratifying improvement. Four chapters of narrative are followed for a little way, and each proves fertile, so far, in humour or pathos. The death of little Johnny is a beautiful example of the latter. There is much of the former in the interview of Venus and Wegg; and both combine in the pretty picture of Bella Wilfer, as she bids fair to become a favourite with all readers. On the whole, the number is excellent.

SCIENTIFIC NEWS.

THE DISCOVERY OF FLINT IMPLEMENTS AND WEAPONS in great abundance near Amiens, in the department of the Somme in France, has been reported to the Academy of Sciences at Paris, by M. Boucher. A space more than a square kilometre, between the valley of the Somme and the railway, is literally covered with debris belonging to the "stone age," consisting of the heads of hatchets and javelins, knives, hatchets, &c., proof of abundant evidence of the work of human hands, and of the actual existence of an establishment for the manufacture of these weapons, which are described as remarkable for their size and finish.

A METEOR, remarkable for its persistent luminous train, between 70 deg. and 80 deg. in length, was observed by M. Boisay, at Rodez, at 5.36, on the evening of Nov. 11. The moonlight was sufficient to be eclipsed by the sudden appearance of this meteor, which traversed the heavens in a direction nearly from south to north, with numerous stars passed through 70 deg. or 80 deg. in three or four seconds. The culminating point was about 30 deg. to the west of the zenith; but the luminous train was not of longer continuance, and passed through several phases. At first it was straight, and linear, and of a dazzling white; soon it enlarged, and diminished in brilliancy; at the expiration of five minutes it remained as a reddish cloud, perfectly distinct, elongated in form, a little more than from 60 deg. to 65 deg. long, and 1 deg. or 2 deg. wide. The cloudy mass, which appeared to be formed of fine sparks drawn out in a very delicate thread, was seen to pass from a cherry to a duck red, seemed to descend very slowly, resembling the setting sun in its appearance. The same evening was seen at Rodez to traverse the train even of a red and blue colour; and also at Blaye. The foregoing details are taken from a letter addressed by M. Boisay, to the annual general meeting of the Academy of Sciences at Paris, and inserted in their Comptes Rendus, vol. lix., No. 20.

THE CHEMICAL ACTION OF LIGHT ON VEGETATION has been recently examined by M. F. Dolfus. From his note, reported to the French Academy of Sciences, as inserted in the Cosmos, for Nov. 18, we give the resume of his researches. After commenting on the action of light on the green matter of plants, as exemplified in the researches of Sachs, Godlewsky, &c., he concludes by saying:—It is seen that the actions are light and heat, immediate decomposition of carbonic acid, formation of carbohydrates, with the evolution of oxygen, and the production of organic substances by the assimilation of nitrogenous compounds, the chief of which are nitrates, which are reduced in the interior of the plant. Light and heat acting together on a vegetable organism manifest, chemically, their energy by the production of oxygen and carbonic acid gas. The vegetable becomes green, and chlorophyll is produced. If life or light be wanting other reductions are produced.

FORMATION OF ICE IN THE SEA.—M. Edlund has contributed a memoir on this subject to the Academy of Sciences at Paris, in which we give a few notes:—1. The maximum of the density of sea water is below the freezing point. 2. The ice formed several degrees below the freezing point, and yet be in a state of equilibrium less unstable than pure water could show to colour ones. 3. Sea water cannot be cooled by evaporation except it; there must be brisk agitation and contact with ice already formed. From these two properties results the possibility of a distribution of temperatures, so that the lower strata of the sea may be much colder than the superficial ones; and hence, when ice is formed at the surface, convection and accidental agitation may produce ice at the bottom of the sea. The ice thus formed may be analogous to that which is found at the bottom of below zero—i.e., constitute a kind of liquid mass, containing solid icy needles. After detaching the surface thin layers of ice, and which, by agitation, may retain in spite of the motion of the waves, which may not sensibly change the relative position of the crystalline elements: under this condition ice may another movement, for example, near the coast, the mass may at last assume a solid form. M. Edlund confirms his views on the formation of ice, partly obtained from the inhabitants of the coasts of Sweden, Norway, and the Isles in the Baltic.

The municipal elections just over in Prussia have all resulted in the success of the Liberal candidates.

The enormous number of 201,597,240 eggs were imported into this country in the first ten months of the present year.

The railway between Stockholm and Malmoe, a town at the north of the Swedish peninsula, on the Sound, nearly opposite Copenhagen, has just been opened. The capital of Sweden is, in consequence, now connected by railway with the whole of the Continent.

According to intelligence received at Paris, the whole of Afghanistan is in a state of insurrection. A battle had taken place between the Ameer and the Khan of Kokan, which had resulted in a loss of 600 men by the latter Prince.

A priest of Noto, in Sicily, named Giardino, has been arrested for having, on a charge of blasphemy, stabbed the crucifix on the altar of the convent he was descending from the altar, after saying mass. The prisoner has been greatly censured.

It is stated that more than a hundred vagrant children are every month rescued from the streets of New York and sent to the west, where the farmers are glad to receive them. This is done by a society styled the Children's Aid Society. The whole expense does not average more than 16dols. for each child.

A warrant of her Majesty in Council appointed the Gazette of yesterday week reciting the powers with a view to the more speedy and efficient administration of justice and the better maintenance of order among the crews of her Majesty's ships in the Mediterranean and the Admiral's protection or resorting to the dominions of the Sublime Ottoman Porte.

Signor Righetti, the discoverer of the bronze colossal statue of Hercules, is not short the difficulty of fixing the statue in the position of preventing it to Fox Nonis. It will be restored and repaired at the Pope's expense, and will form the point of central attraction in the splendid museum of the Vatican.

During November seventeen ships, with 4251 passengers, sailed from Liverpool for the United States; one ship for Queensland, with 371 passengers; and three ships for Victoria, with 1127 passengers. These vessels were under the Act, the total number of ships being twenty-one and passengers 5749. The vessels left Liverpool for the ports of the United States, with 248 passengers; one for New South Wales, with 28 passengers; and for Victoria, with 81 passengers; and for other ports, with 91 passengers: making a total of thirteen ships and 548 passengers not under the Act, and a grand total of thirty-four ships and 6297 for the thirty-four, and passengers 6950.

The opening of All Saints' Church, Windsor, in our last week's Paper, was made from a drawing which the architect, Mr. Arthur W. Blomfield, had the honour of submitting to His Royal Highness the Prince of Prussia, on the occasion of her laying the first stone of this building a fourteenth century. The details, as now constructed, by comparison serving as a passage to the seats in the nave. When finished according to Mr. Blomfield's design, the church will comprise a nave and aisles, and perpetual chapel north of the chancel, with two vestries eastward; while the exterior will display a large western porch and a detached campanile. The sum of £5,000 is required to carry out the proposed additions, by which nearly 400 sittings will be gained.

The Emigration Commissioners dispatched during the last month two emigrant-ships to Adelaide, South Australia—namely, the Matilda Allsopp, which sailed from Plymouth on the 29th ult., and the Lincolnshire last week by the weather), with 280 emigrants; and the Queen Bee, which also sailed from Plymouth, on the 29th, with 313 emigrants. The New Zealand Emigration Board dispatched two ships to Auckland—namely, the Ganges, from Cork, on the 5th, with 304 statute adults, principally agricultural labourers and their families; and the Bombay, which left Gravesend on the 25th, with 400 emigrants. The Emigration Commissioners have chartered the Clara, to sail from Cork on 20th of January next, with emigrants from Plymouth to Adelaide, South Australia; and the Bombay Board have chartered the Juanita to sail from Dublin about the 15th inst., with emigrants to Auckland. Free passages to Auckland and Queensland continue to be granted to married couples and domestic servants, and to Victoria and South Australia to domestic servants only.—Mr. Jordan, Agent-General for emigration for Queensland, has first returned from Brisbane. Among the new regulations adopted during his visit is an authority to advance £5 in the case of each immigrant paying his own passage. The gratuity to the Government will be the deposit of his £20 land order, which is now given without any limitation as to age, and which can be redeemed within two years on payment of £1 for interest and expenses.

A story that General Hooker has been left immensely rich by the death of a Mexican wife in San Francisco is thus denied by the San Francisco Alta:—"1, General Hooker's wife was not rich when he married her, nor at any other time; 2, General Hooker had not a fortune left him by General Hooker's wife is not dead; 4, General Hooker never had a wife; 5, General Hooker is not worth a hundred thousand dollars."

The Missouri Democrat states that Mrs. Francis L. Clayton, now in Missouri, is the lineal descendant of Mr. Paul Revere, who died in 1804, and fought by his side till he was killed in the battle of Stone River, in which engagement Mrs. Clayton's husband was also wounded in the hand, leg, and knee; and at her husband's death made known her act to her General, and was thanked by him.

The New York Times states that persons of both sexes have been guilty of clipping pieces from the window-curtains, sofa, lounge, and other covers of the Senate Chamber, in Washington. They do not stop to sell the repairing from the walls, and even to steal lenery brackets from the windows and doors. The curtains are of crimson damask, and the sofa covers are very costly, and expensive cut up, and nineteen out of twenty brackets are stolen from the Senate Chamber. The Senate Committee is indeed about to be appointed to secure relics of visits to the President's mansion, and indies and gentlemen of high standing have been detected in it. Three ladies whose names are not made known, have been caught in the act within a few days, one of whom lives in Georgetown. The attempt to secure the full names of these brave measures have been taken to prevent a repetition of the offences.

A telegram from the Royal Observatory, Greenwich, says that rain was said on Thursday week, at its home, John-street, Adelphi. The committee examined the effects of the deceased, and found that he died on the night of Tuesday week, last week, and particularly in reference to the loss of two pairs of boots, which he had purchased on the day of his decease, and which, belonging to the institution. It appeared that the performance of the lifeboat crew was highly creditable, and that the service is indeed a most valuable one. The lost was in the act of rescuing the crew of the schooner when the exertions of the crew of the lifeboat, Mr. Thomas Hayward, the coxswain, stood by some of the life-boat crew, four of whom thereupon jumped on board the vessel to assist in the work of rescue. Having by these means the vessel was completely deprived the remainder of the crew of their presence of mind that they had entered into the life-boat, and pushed off. At the same moment realist the ship, all her oars, with the exception of two, were broken, and the life-boat was driven to sea. Fortunately several ships were in sight with the two oars and the help of another life-boat, succeeded in reaching the harbour in safety. Of the crew of the Lowestoft, only 11 were drowned, the two widows and seven orphans. The institution voted £100 in aid of a subscription which has been set on foot for the benefit of the widows. It was said the crew of the life-boat £70 for their gallant exertions. The silver medal of the institution was voted to the coxswain, Thomas Hayward, and another to Mr. Lawrence Payne, chief officer of the Coastguard at Tynemouth, for his services in connection with the rescue of the crew of the schooner. The services during the fearful gales of the past month in rendering the life-boat and Coastguard services to sea in distress off the coast (principally of Kantze, six men saved; schooner Sarah, of Waterford, six; a derelict brigantine, Spanish, name unknown, seven; schooner Ann, of Ipswich; schooner Hermione, of Milford, five; sloop Active, of Carnarvon, three; sloop Ivy, of Workington, Cumberland, three; and the crew of a coasting vessel of twenty-two men; barque Louis XIV., of Dunkirk; fifteen; brig John, of Sunderland, seven; brig Serpent, of Sunderland, seven; schooner David and John, of Montrose, four; Danish galliot Triton, one; Norwegian brig Ivan, seven; Dutch galliot Vrow Johanna, one). The total number of fishing-boats and their crews, thirty-two—making a total of 194 lives saved. The Board of Trade, on the recommendation of the Committee, awarding amounting to £315 4s. were granted to the crews of other life-boats of the institution, their services in saving the crews of vessels in distress from vessels during the storms of the past month. The silver medal of the institution was voted to Mr. J. J. Hall, coxswain of the life-boat, for his month new life-boat of the society, for his long services in assisting in the life-boat, and for his services to sea in the great storm of November 14. Payments amounting to upwards of £2000 were ordered to be made on various vessels and property saved, and £1000 of the funded capital of the institution was ordered to be sold to assist in meeting these heavy payments. The Committee directed the Secretary of Coastguard admitted to the Coastguard Institution a list of about fifty places where it was desirable to place a small, handy chest of life-boat in the event of the institution not being established there. The committee decided to give this important question their best consideration. It was stated that the Duke of Northumberland, Lord-Lieutenant of Northumberland, had been presented to the institution by benevolent persons. The money and the following counties:—Cornwall, Devon, Somerset, Dorset, Hampshire; Sussex, Lincolnshire; and Pool, Lancashire. New life-boats on their way to the stations mentioned were ordered to be sent from the depot at Birmingham. Leeds, and Bradford, and had excited the greatest interest in these inland towns.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

THE will-thread of about £500,000 in gold from the Bank of England, chiefly for shipment to the Continent, and the Bank of England has been compelled to raise the rate of discount on bills, have produced fluctuating markets for National Stocks. The speculators have been on a fair average week; but the public have not been free buyers of the investments. In last since been recovered, the salutes from the Continent show an increase of £1,000,000 sterling. The Bank of England has received £1,000,000 sterling from the Birmingham, Leeds, and Bradford, and had excited the greatest interest in these inland towns.

The following are the rates of discount at the Bank of England and other principal markets:—

	Bank rate per cent.	Open market per cent.		Bank rate per cent.	Open market per cent.

REOPENING OF

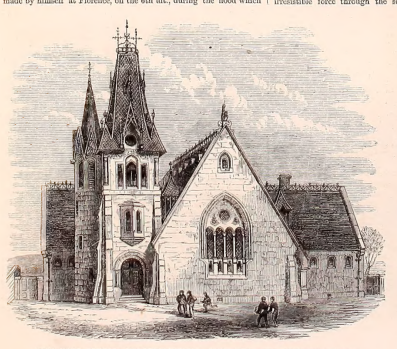
NORTHAMPTONSHIRE.

THE parish church of St. Peter, at Oundle, Northamptonshire, was reopened on the 23rd ult., after undergoing some extensive restorations, executed by Mr. R. Hall, of Nottingham, under the direction of Mr. Gilbert Scott. This church being in a very dilapidated state, it was, some time ago, found necessary to take steps to provide for its repair; but it was not until after two or three ineffectual attempts that the Vicar, the Rev. J. Nussey, was enabled to have the work commenced, which is now successfully performed. The interior consists of a nave, with aisles and transepts, and a chancel, with north and south chapels. The exterior has a lofty embattled tower, with decorated and pierced spire, together about 200 ft. in height. The restoration has been most complete. The unsightly galleries have been removed, also the old-fashioned high-backed pews; and in their place are open seats of carved oak. The western arch was formerly blocked up by some boarding. This has now been removed, and the effect is very striking, and adds much to the beauty of the church. The windows, which are in the Early English or Perpendicular style and exceedingly graceful, have been restored, and a very handsome stained-glass window has been put into the chancel by Messrs. Clayton and Bell, of London. The figures in the first flight represent the Apostles St. James, St. Matthew, St. Mark, St. Peter, St. Paul, St. Luke, St. John, and St. Jude. In the second flight are represented the Nativity, the Baptism, the Crucifixion, the Resurrection, and the Ascension of our Saviour; and in the last flight the Annunciation, the Presentation, Christ's Agony in the Garden, St. Peter and St. John running to the Sepulchre, and the Charge to St. Peter. The stonework has been re-pointed in the nave, transepts, and aisles, and that in the chancels and chapels has been carefully plastered. The walls and arches were formerly covered with plaster or whitewash, and this has been removed, so that the excellent colour of the walls and that of the seatings harmonise completely with each other. The chancel and chancel-chapels have been stuccoed. The nave roof has been entirely stripped and thoroughly restored, new boarded, and leaded. The chancel roof was found to be in such a bad state as to require being made entirely new, which has been done. The floor of the church has been covered with a bed of concrete six inches deep, and the old monumental stones raised to this level. The church originally contained five altars—one in each of the two chapels, one in the chancel, and two in the transepts. In the chancel there are some monuments to the Walcott and other families. Attached to the church is a very fine crypt, which was formerly used as a charnel-house. This has now been cleaned out, and is used as a receptacle for fuel. The chancel is not yet finished, as subscriptions are being raised to purchase a reredos. Mr. Walker, of Francis-street, London, is building a large organ for the church; and, as it could not be finished in time for the reopening, a small but powerful organ was put up for the occasion, and will be used till the large organ is finished. The total cost of the restorations will amount to about £5000.



GREAT FLOOD OF THE RIVER ARNO AT FLORENCE.

WE have been favoured by Mr. E. W. Cooke, R.A., with a sketch made by himself at Florence, on the 6th ult., during the flood which visited that city from the sudden rise of the river Arno, caused by a storm of rain among the neighbouring mountains. Some accounts of it have already been published, but the following extract from Mr. Cooke's letter, dated Florence, Nov. 9, will best explain the sketch we have engraved:—"Having safely crossed the river Po, which was greatly swollen, on my way from Venice, I arrived in Florence by the last train from Bologna before the railway was destroyed, as it was in several places, by the late fearful floods. Heavy falls of rain commenced on Friday, Nov. 4, but on Saturday afternoon a storm of thunder, lightning, and rain commenced, which was almost unparalleled in its force and continuance, and raged till three a.m. on Monday. The pent-up waters of the Mugnone and Arno, with their numerous tributary torrents from the vast amphitheatre of mountains surrounding Florence, suddenly burst into the valley, and rushed with irresistible force through the several bridges, rising in about six hours to the height of 17 ft. Great apprehension was felt for the safety of the Ponte Vecchio, covered with its numerous shops, the flood reaching to the crown of the outer arches of this bridge. The scene between this and the Ponte della Trinità presented the extraordinary appearance of a turbulent sea, not of water, but of mud, mingled with the debris of forests, vineyards, and gardens.

OUNDLE CHURCH, NORTHAMPTONSHIRE, LATELY RESTORED.

"On Sunday evening the Lung' Arno was covered; the torrent flowing over the parapet of the massive wall inclosing the river. Thousands of people could not reach their homes, as strong pickets of police and the military, with torches, guarded the approaches to the bridges. The streets adjoining the river on the southern side were rendered impassable by the depth of the flood. The Cascine was inundated to the depth of some feet, and when the waters subsided a vast mass of drift and mud covered the surface. Many fatal casualties occurred to the passengers by the railway from Pistoja—a massively-built bridge and huge iron girders being almost all carried away. Many persons saved themselves by climbing trees, and were rescued after a fearful night of cold, rain, and hunger. The inundation rose to within a few inches of the white line on the houses opposite the Lung' Arno, marking the level of the great flood of 1844. The sketch (taken from my window, on the Lung' Arno, looking south) represents the beautiful work of Ammanati (built in 1569), the Ponte della Trinità, with the Church of Santo Spirito and the Hill of Bellosguardo in the distance. As regards the city itself, the damage was confined to the houses and streets which are contiguous to the Arno; but in the flat portion of the surrounding country a large amount of property was destroyed or injured.

THE WITCH DOCTORS OF SOUTH AFRICA.

THE Kaffir tribes of British Kaffraria, as well as those in other parts of South Africa, have a large body of native doctors residing amongst them, who exercise great influence over the people, and in whom all the Kaffirs are in the habit of placing implicit confidence for their treatment of the sick. The Kaffirs, indeed, are a doctor-loving people; their doctors and prophets form part of the machinery of their government, which is upheld by their feeling of devout and superstitious obedience. The Kaffir doctor is therefore usually patronised and supported by the chief of the tribe. The corporation or college of native practitioners of South Africa consists of men and women, some of whom confine themselves to the more practice of medicine; while others, not content with the administration of native remedies, profess to be able to "smell out" the persons who have, as they say, bewitched the sick people. Every doctor is supposed to have been called to his profession by a supernatural authority. It may be that during an illness he has acquired, or fancies he has acquired, a knowledge of the medicinal properties of some plant, the secret of which, he tells his friends, has been communicated to him by the spirits. Some of the doctors of the tribe are then consulted, and if it should be decided that he has "a call," he goes into retirement for some time; during which he holds little if any intercourse with the world, being devoted to the acquisition of knowledge from the spirits. During his retreat a dance is frequently held to propitiate the spirits on his behalf. At the end of his retreat the doctors assemble; the candidate for admission as a member of the healing art is then duly examined, and, if he be considered qualified, the herb or plant, the properties of which are said to have been revealed to him, is cut up, boiled in water, and poured over the head of the aspirant to the medical profession. This ceremony is called "Ukupeleleswa," and the doctor who performs the ceremony generally gets a fee for his trouble. A cow or bullock is then killed, in order that the doctors may partake of it in company. The Kaffir doctors believe and teach that all disease is caused by witchcraft. The conjurors can inflict awful torture and even death upon the unhappy victims of this degrading superstition. The following instance, related by a Kaffir chief, is told in the very words of an Englishman who witnessed the affair:—

"When I was living at ——'s place, one of his councillors was taken sick, and —— told his people to go and say to Mazonda, a witch doctor, that he wished him to 'smell out' the person who had bewitched the sick man. The doctor came, and the people were collected for a witch dance. We all formed a circle, standing close together. The men began by striking together bundles of assagais, singing at the same time, and throwing their bodies into all sorts of contortions; while the women did the same, clapping their hands. The doctor then made his appearance; his face, one side of his body, and arms, were painted white; the other side was painted red; a jackal's tail stood out at right angles from his forehead, fastened round his head by a band; his arms were encircled with rings of ivory; his neck, wrists, and ankles with rings and beads. He commenced by running round the sequence is, that they will sometimes even death upon the unhappy victims of this degrading superstition. The following instance, related by a Kaffir chief, is told in the very words of an Englishman who witnessed the affair:—

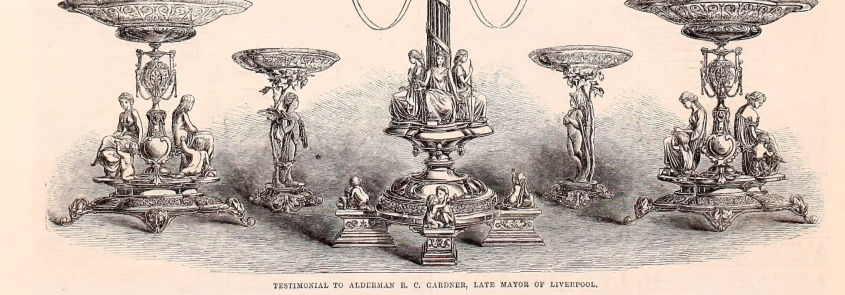
circle with uplifted head and dilated nostrils, smelling for the person who had bewitched the sick man. A councillor named Doula, and a woman named Naguta, one of the wives of the sick man's father, were accused by the doctor of having bewitched the sick man. They were instantly seized and stripped of all their ornaments, and reins were put round their necks. The doctor said that Doula had frequently asked the sick councillor for cattle, which he had refused, and that Doula, out of revenge, had bewitched him; and that Nagnta had asked a bullock from the sick man in order to get the hide to make a kaross, which the sick man had refused; and that on this account she also had bewitched him. Doula and Nagnta were then beaten with knob-kerries about the head and face, producing fearful wounds. The victims cried out, 'Stop! we will show where the bewitching matter is with which we made the man sick!' They only said this, however, to escape being tortured. They showed pieces of dry dung and various other substances, which they declared to be the materials of their witchcraft. Messengers were then sent to the doctor to know if it were true that the prisoners had given up all the bewitching matter; to which he replied, 'No; it is not true; they have more.' A fire was then lighted and stones placed on it; the man Doula was bound down to stakes fixed in the ground, lying on his back, quite naked, with his arms extended, and hot stones were placed over his chest and belly, as well as along the inside of his arms and thighs. Nagnta, the woman, was treated in the same manner; and both, after being thus cruelly tortured, were tied to a tree by the necks and there beaten to death with knob-kerries.'



We are indebted for this communication, and for the photograph from which we have engraved our portrait of a Kaffir witch doctor, to Mr. S. D. Maudy, who supplied us with a view of the Grey Hospital and Medical College, in British Kaffraria, published in this Journal a few months ago.

A JAPANESE BARBER.

We present this week another of those characteristic Illustrations of the manners and customs of the Japanese people, with which our Artist and Correspondent at Yokohama has abundantly supplied us. The sketch we have here engraved represents a Japanese barber in the act of dressing the head of one of his patients. He is gathering up the topknot, which is to be tied with an ornamental band, the rest of the crown being scrupulously shaved. The whole operation is tedious enough, but the elderly gentleman whom we see under the barber's hands in this instance has evidently made up his mind to a long sitting, with his legs tucked beneath the low table on which are placed a pair of basins containing the soap-lather and other lavements. The Japanese cutlery is excellent, and there is no fear of a blunt razor in this respectable barber's shop.

TESTIMONIAL TO ALDERMAN R. C. GARDNER OF LIVERPOOL.

It will be remembered that near the close of the mayoralty of Alderman R. C. Gardner a number of his friends, appreciating the admirable manner in which he had discharged his official duties and the respect entertained for him in private life, resolved upon presenting him with an appropriate mark of their esteem. Although no subscription-list was published, the suggestion was immediately acquiesced in, so that the amount subscribed soon reached the handsome sum of nearly £1000. Subsequently, the committee were actively engaged in making the preliminary arrangements necessary for carrying out the wishes of the subscribers. After a competition among the principal silversmiths of Liverpool, the design submitted by Messrs. Wordley and Co., of Lord-street, was accepted. The design—which is intended in some measure to illustrate the prominent characteristics of Mr. Gardner's career—consists of an elegant desert service of eleven pieces. They comprise a centrepiece, 4 ft. 9 in. in height, elaborately ornamented; also two oval fruit-stands, and four large and four small circular fruit-stands. In the centrepiece there are four corner pedestals, supporting groups of boys engaged in plucking grapes and the various operations of pressing and preparing wine. On the principal pedestal are seated personifications of Faith, Justice, Industry, and Commerce, as the four elements of the late Mayor's successful career; and on the top of the column is introduced a figure of Peace, in reference to the auspicious circumstances associated with his term of office. A small shield on the base bears Mr. Gardner's coat-of-arms, an inscription expressive of the feelings of the donors being engraved upon a ribbon by which it is surrounded. To indicate the interest at all times manifested by the late Mayor in schools and charitable institutions, both in his official and private capacity, Benevolence is represented on one of the oval fruit-stands as offering temporal aid, and in that upon the other as extending spiritual instruction to the poor. Music, Poetry, Painting, and Sculpture have been similarly introduced on the large circular centrepiece; while upon the four smaller ones appear figures emblematical of Morning, Noon, Evening, and Night. The figures are executed in frosted silver, bright silver being employed for the bases. The testimonial is in every respect a most finished specimen of art, and worthy of the manufacturers.

TESTIMONIAL TO ALDERMAN R. C. GARDNER, LATE MAYOR OF LIVERPOOL.

A JAPANESE BARBER.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.

THE CUNARD COMPANY'S NEW IRON MAIL STEAM-SHIP CUBA.

The noble fleet of vessels belonging to Messrs. Cunard, Burns, and M'Iver, comprising some of the largest and swiftest mail-steamers afloat, are employed in the Mediterranean, the Liverpool and Havre, and the Glasgow and Liverpool trades, the daily mail service between Glasgow and Belfast, but especially the weekly mail service between this country and Halifax, Boston, and New York, with which is connected the monthly mail service between New York, Nassau, and Havannah also performed by their vessels. The Belfast mails are carried gratuitously; but for the American mails the company are paid the annual sum of £176,340 by the Post Office authorities. They have now carried these mails for nearly thirty years, and during the whole of this time have never lost a single passenger. The present fleet of this company is thirty-two ships of 50,588 tons burden in the aggregate, with engines collectively of 12,225-horse power; and they have six other ships now building for them on the Clyde, which will make their aggregate tonnage amount to 62,000 tons, with engines of 15,000-horse power. In tonnage and steam power this is more than equal to the whole navies of some Continental Powers.

The Cuba, of which we give an Engraving, has just been completed for the Liverpool and New York line of the Cunard Company, by Messrs. Todd and MacGregor, of Glasgow, at a cost of £110,000. She was launched in July last, and is a majestic-looking ship, of fine proportions, yet possessing great carrying capacity, and constructed throughout in a most substantial and elegant manner. The dimensions of her hull are as follow:—Length of keel and fore-rake, 327 ft.; breadth of beam, moulded, 42 ft.; depth, moulded, to spar-deck, 29ft. Tonnage, 2832 tons. B.M. The propelling force is that of the oscillating geared engines, by her builders, of 650-horse power, nominal, fitted with surface-condensers and all recent improvements. The steam is supplied by four boilers heated by twenty-four furnaces. The waste steam is blown off under water, thus doing away with the disagreeable noise resulting from the old system. She has nine water-tight compartments, four of which come to the upper deck; Cunningham's patent reefing topsails; and Sir Snow Harris's lightning-conductors, as applied to iron ships. The fore and main lower masts are of Vancouver Island timber, each in one piece about 32 in. in diameter. A deckhouse, 20 ft. wide, extends from stem to stern, in which 300 passengers can dine at a time. The Cuba has also mail-sorters', butchers', bakers', confectioners', and pastrycooks' rooms, similar to those on board the Scotia and Persia. She has accommodation for 300 first-class passengers, and, if employed as a troop-ship, could transport 1500 men. Our Engraving is from a drawing by Mr. Hugh Aird, of Glasgow.

CRAMER and CO.'S PIANOFORTES, NEW, by Broadwood, Collard, or Pleyel, for SALE or HIRE, at CRAMER'S PIANOFORTE GALLERY, 207 and 209, Regent-street.

CRAMER'S ENGLISH PIANETTE. 28 guineas. Cramer and Co. manufacture this cottage model instrument. It has all the compass, touch, and quality of tone of a cottage pianoforte, and is made less. The case is of polished ash or walnut, in the Elizabethan style. Handsome fronts of the upper part, the rest gradually sloping more rapidly than on an old cabinet, so as to give the greatest possible projection to the sounding-board and 28 guineas.
The attention is particularly requested to observe that this instrument has no metal frame, and is free of risk of change of tune or check action; and that Cramer and Co. were the original manufacturers.

MUSICAL BOXES for CHRISTMAS PRESENTS.—BOSWELL'S BOXES have the full, rich, and powerful tone of the Cathedral Organ, and the celebrated Mode, or Expression Movement, which gives the instrument the power of the human voice. Boswell's Boxes are the most perfect, and the most popular music of the day, including selections from the celebrated Mode, at 3, Argyll-street, Regent-street, W. Catalogues gratis and post-free.

GENERAL TODLEBEN, THE RUSSIAN MILITARY ENGINEER.

OUR Portrait, from a photograph by M. Steinberg, of St. Petersburg, is a fair likeness of that distinguished professor of the arts of military engineering and fortification who has lately visited this country as the guest of Captain Blakeley and has been received with much honour by the members of his own profession amongst us. Francis Edward Todleben, born at Mitau, in Courland, on the 8th of May, 1818, though a subject and servant of the Russian empire, is of German race. His father was a respectable merchant of the place just named. He was educated in the Imperial School of Engineers at St. Petersburg, and rose steadily in the ranks of his profession till 1848, when Captain Todleben was sent to take part in the siege of the Circassian fortresses in the Caucasus. After spending two or three years in this arduous service, he returned to the capital, and devoted himself to the theory and science of fortification, while directing the experimental operations of the sappers of the Gouzi at Peterhof. In 1854 he was promoted to be Lieutenant-Colonel, and was sent to the army of the Danube at the outbreak of the war with Turkey, but was soon transferred to the army of the Crimea. The circumstances under which he was intrusted with the construction of those extraordinary works for the defence of Sebastopol, which form one of the greatest achievements of military mechanics in recent times, must be fresh in the recollection of most of our readers. Since the peace of 1856 General Todleben has had no active employment, but has been much engaged in scientific and literary studies. His recently-published "Narrative of the War in the Crimea" has given rise to some controversies, of which probably we have not yet heard the last.

MARRIAGE FESTIVITIES AT QUIDDENHAM HALL.

QUIDDENHAM, in Norfolk, the seat of the Earl of Albemarle, was the scene of glad festivities on Wednesday week, upon the occasion of the marriage of Lady Louisa Keppel, the Earl's daughter, to the Hon. Frederick William Charteris, Commander, R.N., a son of the Earl of Wemyss and March. The ceremony took place in the Church of St. Andrew, Quiddenham, which had been tastefully decorated with evergreens and flowers by some of the ladies of the neighbourhood. The service was performed by the Hon. and Rev. E. S. Keppel, uncle of the bride. It was witnessed by the Earl and Countess of Albemarle, the Earl of Wemyss and March; Admiral Sir H. Keppel, K.C.B.; the Hon. Colonel Cust, Lord Charles Scott; Viscount Bury, M.P.; Viscountess Bury; Lord Elcho, M.P., and Lady Elcho; Hon. J. Lindsay, Lady Maria Keppel, and Lady Sophia Keppel, with a numerous company of friends. There were seven bridesmaids—Lady Augusta Keppel, Lady Georgiana Russell, Miss Bedford, Miss Garnier, Miss Theodora Keppel, Miss Isabella Stephenson, and Miss May Hill. The bridegroom was accompanied by Lord Charles Scott. The wedding-party, having returned to the hall, were entertained with breakfast, and numerous gifts were presented to the newly-married pair; amongst which was a little silver box, turned by Prince Alfred, and inscribed with the initial of his Royal Highness; while Mr. Etheridge, on the part of the tenantry, handed to the bride a handsome gold bracelet, with three diamonds, set in stars. It contained the following inscription:—"Presented to the Lady Louisa Keppel as a mark of esteem by the tenantry and agent of the Earl of Albemarle on her wedding-day." About four o'clock the happy couple left the hall in a carriage and four. They were greeted with the hearty acclamations of a large number of persons assembled in the park. Our Illustration will give some idea of this scene. Flags were flying from the roof of the mansion, and at each evergreen arch; on the one at the Kenninghall entrance there was an inscription, "Long live the Queen," with smaller mottoes by the side, "Peace and Content," and "Union and Liberty." In the carriage drive from the hall to the church there were two triumphal arches of evergreens. On the arch nearest to the hall there were two mottoes—on one side, "God bless the Union," surmounted by the monogram, "A. W.," and on the other side "Long Life and Happiness," with the reversed monogram, "W. A." The other arch bore the initials of the bride and bridegroom.

Captain and Lady Louisa Charteris proceeded, by way of Thetford and Ely, to Peterborough, where they were to pass a week or two at Holme Wood, the residence of Lady Louisa Wells, sister of the bride.

MARRIAGE FESTIVITIES AT QUIDDENHAM PARK, NORFOLK, THE SEAT OF THE EARL OF ALBEMARLE.

THE SMITHFIELD CLUB CHRISTMAS SHOW.

SAVE and except the stereotyped bullock on the omnibuses, everything seems to have changed since the good old Baker-street days. Frost and snow are out of the December book of fashions. The club "grinds up the saplings," and has no sympathy of sympathy left for orthodox ox-beef; and the grey-haired seniors and juveniles of the fat-stock world, instead of waiting for the thrilling moment, about the stroke of eight, and then dashing in pell-mell like a flock of sheep, manage to hear the fate of the gold medal, now pessily take their seat in the Islington gallery early in the day, and watch every judicial feature into attitude of the cautious and "dauntless three." We are not impugning the principle of progress. Far from it. Years ago, when we came back from Dublin, we narrated how we had watched all the phases of the great yearling-bull St. Lager from the gallery, we had seen the bullock's every step of way "who put their trust in weddes and in bereves," and never will be again. But the cock "pungs" has departed, and the cock-fight has all left Islington by six o'clock, and after that the wheels of the evening drive heavily enough.

The death of Mr. Fowler, who has so long stood in the van of the steam-plough makers, was received with deep regret. It seems that he had been taken ill on his return home from the Scotch Fair, and set off to Yorkshireen also told of the Jacksonian purchase of Blair Athol for 8,500 guineas. Sir Joseph would not quit the field without a battle, and Sam Wiley had won the bullock cup at the York show; and it was also stated by them most confidently that the Warleby herd will be sold.

The two cups were not decided till after three o'clock, and then, as the sale avenues were at liberty, the public flocked in masses to the gallery to the nearest points to look on. Sir William Capel de Brooke's fine Shorthorn, the cock "pungs" of the show, had won the special prize, as both were out of the place in the company they were now called upon to sing. The Hereford judges, it was said, held out for Mr. Phillips's ox at first, but at last they had to give way, and after all the Birmingham flourish of trumpets which heralded him, he is—not to say the gallery or myself—content with the honour alone and without especial grandeur as a whole. As for Mr. Martin's ox, which ran him so close at Birmingham, no one seemed to look at him, except those who were outside the ring. Judges are not always single-minded generally, and dislike "a crossbred," unless his pretensions are overpowering. One of them noticed that he was "a little bit Shorthorn-ways" manner, as he fairly flew at him and gave him two blows with his fist, as if by way of impressing his contempt upon it; and with these compliments of the season the Aberdeen and Darlington cock of 1862 was "pungs" again. His sister, Mr. Amcotts seemed to preach the merits of a young red and white as cautiously as before the Birmingham meeting, was crossed, and eventually the whole bench were converts to his eloquence, and the red and white rosette went to Darlington. As a judge, we do not think that it met with general inderesment. The Hereford men had to it; and they were not there to cavil at the award, even when, although his shoulders were good enough, 7ft. 11 in. was all that could be made of the Shorthorn's lovely quarters. The cow and heifer cup was a much shorter business. Even the Hereford people did not claim it very loudly. Mr. Cochman's cow, although she was a Birmingham gold medallist; and, although, as Mr. Cochman had told Lady Windsor, he openly said that she had no claim to beat the roan Trinket, the shorthorn sceptre was wrested from her hands, and well done the week before.

The Show has long had a traditional leaning to London, as have the Hereford to Bingley Hall, and the twelve entries of the Midlands were mostly from Mr. Morgan. The young steer, bred by Mr. George Turner, was, of course, not fully furnished, but the symmetry and quality of coat he was very beautiful. A fine loin starved some other points in Mr. Thompson, of Elmsthorpe's Shorthorn "the commercial beast," and, with a few exceptions, very little beyond it. It was a case of about as tall animals as them; and, even in the case of Birmingham judges (a very bad plan, as exhibitors have a right, in fairness, to the advantage of a fresh eye), the decisions were very much altered. Mr. Philippe had two commended steers, bred by Mr. Monkhouse, and now hailing from Surrey, on each side of him; but one had gone in his rough coat, and the other was not very apt his other points as he did his length, which was very fine. The females were much cleverer. Lady Alsford looked half the size of her coeval Bonilface in the heifer class; but in her loin, and skin, and in strong, and there were two new heifers from Mr. Stratton's, of Gloucester and Mr. Baldwin's Bright Eyes, who shared the H. C. with another young thing. Friday the 13th, whose horn might have been larger with advantage.

The six Shorthorn oxen and steers were more level, perhaps, as a lot than the Hereford; but still there was a considerable space much of a muchness, and probably if they had been shuffled up a third trio, those antethics would have diffused as much from the Islington bench as the second did (barring the double dose) from the Birmingham. Mr. Stratton got a C. and H. C. in the young class with a roan, roans and Mr. Arkwright wound up this causa mirabilis, in which each, by winning the cup with his thirty months' youngster in the very first week of the class. By way of making it more so, he got £70 of it through Mr. Gibbett, the eminent salesman and founder of the ball and its house show. The winner was a clever beast, of a beautiful Christmas coat and colour, and Mr. Arkwright is the Cicero's Archidocus sort. Mr. Pulver's winner in the next class lacked shortness of leg and a little more quality, but his absolutely great remark applies to the Geddington ox, who had a remarkably sweet countenance in taking style under him, at first sight, but would hardly bear pulling to pieces.

Two famous writers followed in his wake, one of them Earl Gainsborough's, which should have decidedly shown in front of Mr. Baird, a deep, short-legged one of Mr. Carr's, and a great Yorkshire winner; and therefore this subject of the most decisional quality was Mr. Carr's the Turf bookmaker. The judging in this class was directly opposed to the Birmingham, which certainly gave more with our views, as nothing could justify pleasing Mr. Outhwaite without even a mention. The fore legs are a trifle forward and his rump ends are not just the thing, and an inch off his legs would bring wonderful order into his loins, firm touch and contour, are very nice. Mr. Moir had an H.C. making the second, with two C's and a third prize, that he has received on his trial-trip from Aberdeenshire south.

Trinket, a granddaughter of Great Mogul, and with all the fine substance but rather common piggish head which he bestowed on Chaste a chance; and Mr. Aldworth was third among the heifers with a lengthy white. The winning cow, Lady Windsor, was of Mr. Stratton's breeding, and a very fair one, with beautiful bone, but rather sloping behind. She was not in very high company, although Empress of Hindostan was among them. This wonderful cow has only had one calf in her seven years and two months, and if ever After being constantly at store shows and winning largely. Lady Pigot took a gold medal with her as best fat cow in Poissy in 1862; last year she was up at gold-medal pitch for the Branches sale, and many people have since said that Ladyship did not keep her and try for it. Mr. Crisp bought her as a speculative bargain for £50, and here she ends her days. Her name has some magic yet, as the shorthorn men pricked up their ears when they heard of her, and we sent off two or three sons of visitors to her for "said lang syne."

Lord Lonsdale's pen of fat cattle looked well, and had rather a nice first-prize heifer, Young Handsome; and, oddly enough, in the store class, the judges reversed the county decision, and put a great big fellow over the head of a much more compact and far smaller one, which might have stood without objection among the Devon cows. "Double their length" is the trade phrase for "good breed," and yet the countrymen, who ought to set the fashion, thought otherwise, and Mr. Spencer's steer was put well at the head.

The dark chestnut Suffolks were not themselves in any means. One of Mr. Pollok's was all but Galloway about the head and ears, and the winning cow was rough and coarse. Lord Ashburton was a pair of solemn antediluvians, and we shall be surprised if the winner's head is not thrown back in the Islington gallery. Mr. Overman swung with the West. Highland class since the juicy little Badminton must be to almost to-day's proper representative. Now it is all size and humbug. Two great Breadalbane drovers, the tenth and the fifteenth in succession; but an "Argyle black," of very square Lowland mould, and a very beautiful beast, was second to Mr. Baird's. Mr. Percy's Birmingham winner was not entered, but returned, like one of Mr. M'Combie's, for the Liverpool show, of which his Lordship is the President. The great Aberdeen feeder was in the ring, and there held a very great fat show on Tuesday; and it would have saddened those who had seen him when he was "doing" Kelvin Grove, if stomach of true years' standing, was a royal beast in its box at home, with a neck and chine as long as Stanley Rees's when she was in all her better prize at Aldborough. It was so old when it started from Aldford that it was five men and six beasts to coax it to the station at Alford; but the journey had pleased it, and it could hardly have told it again. It was accompanied by a splendid example of the yellow variety, which cost 1,000 guineas prize at Birmingham; and it got first prize at both places, quite easily. Mr. Heath's leviathan was a winner from the Gerioch; but, deep as he was, his dreadful middle was fatal to him and his London fame. Mr. Scattergood's Queensberry was a picture of the Angus females at Kelso, won easily in the female class; but she has been going down for a year or two, and Mr. Gordon's, and never polished her Sixty-three promise. Of course, Mr. Ewins Bromsgrove had a good Welsh, and, of course, it wins. The Irish heifers were generally a big lot, and Mr. Bruce's and the prize Scotch cattle-men were headed by a very capital grey of Mr. Thomas Dawson, of Poundsworth, near Driffield—a Durham and Galloway cross, and the fine fusion of King Shorthorn in these classes was boundless—with Mr. Duncan's tall, High-class Ayrshire, Argus, and Galloway, and, in the case of the third prize, Mr. Cowan's winner from the Gerioch; to hear a "Buchan" defeated. Two beasts bred by Mr. Moir were in the cross-Shorthorn class, and the one that was not the Aberdeen horns in Aberdeenshire for more than thirty years, and all round Buchan and Banff are the only Polled Scots in question. There is no doubt that if Mr. Martin had put his ox into the pure-bred class he would have won the first prize and had no prejudice against him for the cup. Only one of the Aberdeen polled heifers had been taken from widewake Aberdeen that the public had seen the best of him. He was in great bloom when he left Aberdeen, and again when he won at Darlington last Christmas; but when the judges had got over his eyes and our only wonder is that with the disposition to break down on the hind legs he has not been taken him along so well. Mr. Longmore's grey shorthorn and poll has been with him for a year or both, and was the first Shorthorn that ever beat his Rose of Summer born to the Douglas blood on his sire's side. The hundred heifer in Mr. Ald's class, having was so good that they brought her out for the cup. She is a lovely roan, and has by long odds the most symmetrical fore leg we ever looked at, better even than Mr. Cochman's, and she has a beautiful head, with a fine combination of "shorthorn and mongrel;" and Mr. Alan Pollok sent one in which blended the two with great success, and got the third prize for the breed. In the extra stock Sir Thomas Lennard's "Brittany" looked like Mr. Highland and Argyle, with a dash of Brahman; a breed which had blended with Shorthorn and Galloway in the Scotch Highlands from time immemorial, and colour, and horn, but retaining its shape, especially about the shoulders, quite its own.

The male sprout of the outer porch were very ably headed by a Cheshire Shorthorn stock bull, Mr. Monkhouse. The Duke of Athole had one of his prize Breadalbane cattle, and a very wonderful blind leg, which might well be highly commended; but some of the others were not quite so commendable. Mr. Ewins had evidently the able presidency of Mr. Sharpe's roan cow, the best shorthorn at the Birmingham show, and Mr. Cochman's heifer with the Stratton, who is "coming" fast again on his old fat-show ground. The class terms of "Buffalo," or rather, the Brahmin, with the bone of a deer and as sharp as a racehorse, were unfortunate. Mr. Ewins's Hereford headed for a half shorthorn and Hereford; and Mr. Duckham was placed in the class with a beast of the same breed of reds with white facings to which he is always such a trusty adjutant.

The Hereford cow class was more striking; but still they were a very good level average, and not—to speak of the cup cow—by any means still, only one lot failed to pass the "dentist." In point of first prizes, the Shorthorn cows were very good, and Mr. Stratton's cow and her pens the whites were seven to five, and the gold medal went to the Hereford, although Mr. Cochman says "Empress of Cross" whites of Mr. John Saunders, of Blandford. For hair and nice getting up we have seldom handled for a half shorthorn and Hereford; and Mr. Duckham was head Mr. Arkwright's cow, and Mr. Ewins's pair of reds with white facings to which he is always such a trusty adjutant.

The Hereford cow class was more striking; but still they were a very good level average, and not—to speak of the cup cow—by any means still, only one lot failed to pass the "dentist." In point of first prizes, the Shorthorn cows were very good, and Mr. Stratton's cow and her pens the whites were seven to five, and the gold medal went to the Hereford, although Mr. Cochman says "Empress of Cross" whites of Mr. John Saunders, of Blandford. For hair and nice getting up we have seldom had such fancy rears than Mr. Pelham Warren's Essexes, which beat Mr. Arkwright's Leicesters at the head of the class; and these ones had added "sugar" to their bill of fare, and all bore a remarkable resemblance to Mr. Warren's Lord Lyon.

A Weston third-prize lot in the next class were very hairless, one of them positively shaved for the show. The "Chilton inspired" were by no means unlikely, and deficient behind, and not quite so good in the leg in quality. The winner in the extra stock had the skin of a Shorthorn, and the same dairy look about the head and neck, and good lifetimes. We never knew where Sir Thomas Whichcote's great spotted one was to be placed in the Birmingham judging; and there was one of the old sort, with ears, and snout, and colour as if he had run afoul of a Morland picture, and therefore not exactly a silver medallist.

Among the Leicesters, Mr. Foljambe fairly lost his lead, and was only fifth to Mr. Walmesley, who top-weighted a pen of three of the Lord Berners in another. Mr. Walmesley was backed up in the young class by his neighbour, Mr. Jordan. Of a truth, the Yorkshire men, both at The Royal and Smithfield, are taking a strong Leicester lead, and the old Sledmere blood is cropping up and blossoming gaily in the hands of the proprietor and Mr. Stephenson, whose head is gone. There were only four entries each in Cotswolds and Lincolns, the Lincolns from Mr. Needham at the head of affairs, which is a guarantee of itself; but Mr. Riley's Romney Marsh winner was not quite downhill enough at the hind side, and seem to have lost all individuality in the Beverley air. A very extra Cotswold was shown and ewe stock the Burley and Barleythorpe pastures had each a prize or more, and the family name was not to be disgraced by them. In the other extra long-wool classes, Mr. Marshall's Lincoln had it pretty much their own way with Kents. The three Southdown classes were fought out between the Duke of Richmond and Mr. Rigden, Mr. Jonas, and the Baron won the rubber, and the cup as well. In the heavyweights the Duke's team was the best; the judges seemed afraid to decide it, and looked and looked again; and in the extra Southdown class it was the Duke's pen that was sent back with the ewe, and Goodwood with the wether. It was a great show for Southdowns, but still, although the individual sheep of striking merit, the pens were not so much of the pen-in-the-pod-stamp as we have seen them. This was also the case, not with Mr. Canning's rare first-prize Hampshires, but with the two pens behind it, which each had a very moderate sheep in them. One of Mr. Waller's was so very much below the mark that we doubted his right to be second.

There was no gainsaying the Shropshires; but we were not especially struck with the Oxford Downs, as a whole. Anyone who once for fixity of type should see them before he comes to the Southwolds, Shrops, and Hampshires. The little Exmoors were very thick and good, and seem to have more of a very great Christmas stride; and Mr. Peel won with some very rich black and white faced lonk wethers, by a son of Mountain King, who has been sold into Scotland to cross the Wrights. The flowing Rylands, with their snug whiskers and their Wrightsian fleeces, were a grand, useful specimen of cold sheep croppers; and the interest of the cross classes centred in the varieties of the cross between the Leicester and the Southdown, of which there were certainly three distinct ones in fleece, colour of face, and size. The Cheviots received a second silver cup again with this sort.

The opening of the large doors into the yard kept up a very capital temperature, and was only thing that some of the leading exhibitors seem to desire are small fires for encouraging for a certain distance, so as to keep the cattle from grouping together as they do so awkwardly. The machine implement classes, as usual, in great force, and a good many required outside to see the fork Jack and the Cambridge Roller at Work. Ploughs, for raising straw on to a stack at a thirty yards the "beats" used for hogs in Scotland. It slipped on and off very easily, and the contrivance for raising the end was striking. Alderman Spiers's Cycloptean Waistbands were also a feature. The interference which had just been hit for £100 and law expenses for Lawrence's Patent Waistband being foul, which might, it is said, have been settled without a lawsuit. The following is a list of the prizes, besides the silver medals, and has a balance in its favour of £4748, and £2091 invested, the judges were:—For cattle—Devons, Hereford, Sussex, Norfolk, Welsh, and extra stock—E. Bowley, Siddington House, Cirencester; F. Fowler, Benlow, Biggleswade; James Topham, Watford, Notts. For sheep—Leicesters, Cotswolds, Lincolns, Romney Marsh, Cheviots, Exmoors, Oxford Downs, and extra stock—R. J. Newton, Campsfield House, Woodstock; John Marriott, Wrington, Bristol; Charles Howes, Haut, West Denham Abbey, Stoke Ferry, Norfolk. Southdowns, Hampshires, Shropshires—H. The Queen has appointed Donald Malcolm Logie, Esq., Legal Vice-Consul, Cancellier, and Registrar of the Consular Court at Smyrna, to be her Majesty's Consul-General at Constantinople. The Queen has approved of Signor Fortunato Lamberto as Consul at Cefalonia for the King of Italy.

The English brig Dee, Captain Mackie, recently arrived at Malta with the crew of the Hesperus, of Manchester, rescued from that vessel, which had foundered at sea. About the same time the French ship Emperor the English steamer Jewess, which had been abandoned four days before. Both captains had refused any remuneration for their services, but the British Minister at Athens has presented Captain Mackie with a valuable marine glass, with a commemorative inscription; while the Cunard steamer Jura, who had saluted a silver medal in 1857, a gold one has now been conferred.

SPORTS OF THE MONTH.

DECEMBER.

ALTHOUGH King Frost occasionally puts an end to hunting during this month, in his absence good sport may generally be expected, especially after a fall of snow, which cleanses the land and increases the scent. Shooting, too, may be had in perfection by the expert and shrewd, for many of our leading sportsmen think no more of a trip to Norway than the Americans did in former years to Ireland or Scotland. A man devoted to the trigger may pass the months of August, September, and October in Scotland in pursuit of deer, black game, and grouse, and arrive in the Norwegian territory in time to kill many a capercailzie before Christmas; or, if disposed to make a Transatlantic trip, he may reach North America, and there have good deer stalking before the new year commences, either in the prairies, Nova Scotia, or Canada.

Stalking, as applied to game, means a stealthy approach to it under cover of a blind. All predatory birds cautiously avoid the approach of man, and wild-fowl are equally shy; consequently stalking is a more difficult to get near than deer, as they are for ever on the watch. When the stalker-sportsman is not introduced, we know not; but it was much in vogue among our great-grandfathers. Then a man, or a figure representing the noble animal, and was mounted on wheels, by means of which the sportsman approached its object, contriving to keep himself concealed from the observation of his game. It was a cunning contrivance, but the brutal, of which there were two kinds, when these birds were driven in a drove, against wild geese, wild-fowl, partridges, and hares. After a time, a sort of hand-machine, which seemed to trundle and expense; and decentalking is now carried on throughout the Highlands of Scotland by live animals much more calculated to ascend and descend the mountains than mechanical imitations. Many sportsmen have a taste for this amusement, and the line of the old hunting-song, "This day a stag must die," is generally practised on the mountains, with some Highlanders acquainted with the ground and the haunts of the deer. The eye to detect the game, the passes or tracks frequented by the deer, along which they are sure to pass when disturbed, and the wind, which is the stalker's greatest enemy, is breathless anxiety, are prepared for them, with one or two trained dogs, ready to slip in case the deer is wounded and makes off. Deer, even when mortally wounded, will frequently run a very considerable distance. While deer-stalking in the Highlands of Scotland, Sir Edmund Antrobus, landshire; in the more remote part of the latter county they have seldom seen a human being, and the shy beast does not make his appearance in a dozen years. Stag-hunting over the mountains of Killing the stag is by stalking it with a rifle-gun, and requires patience and perseverng to succeed in this exciting diversion.

Red grouse, as well as the ptarmigan, are found in Wales, Ireland, and Scotland; in the Hebrides, and in the Orkneys. The red grouse inhabit wild moors, mountainous districts, and are equally abundant in the dreary regions of the Grampians, unaccustomed to the human footstep of the Peninsula," on the wild moors of the Hebrides, on the hilly ranges of the north of Ireland, the Cheviots, Yorkshire, and the heather-covered mountains of Peebles, Dumfries, and Selkirk. These birds pair early in the spring, and begin to lay as soon as grass is green. The eggs vary from eight to fourteen in number, and are of a reddish or dun colour, thickly spotted, entirely covered with large spots of amber brown. Notwithstanding the numbers that are yearly shot down on some moors, and the number of poachers that are to be found carrying on their destructive practices on others, the rapid and sliding loops of horsehair set up across their runs, they are still plentiful in many districts. The Earl of Ducie's gamekeeper, some five-and-twenty years ago, was matched for a wager to shoot sixty brace of moor game in the course of the 12th of August upon his Lordship's moors in Gloucestershire. He performed the task with greatest ease, although the weather only in the morning was much against him. On the 12th of August, 1844, Sir Edmund Antrobus shot two brace of moor game in one day. The above feats are recorded as wonderful: but in Scotland many a sportsmen would be found to kill quite as many, if not more, especially when the seasons, when the young birds lie close. Grouse can an average weigh about 24l. on the scale before being plucked, but they frequently reach 28l. and one of one killed near Richmond, in Yorkshire, which weighed 25 oz., and at another in Aberdeenshire that measured 30 inches by 29 oz. These birds are found in Lancashire, Derbyshire, and Staffordshire, but they are not in any degree for sport than at Beaudesert in the latter county.

The ptarmigan is the smallest of the Grouse tribe in Britain, although it formerly was to be found on the mountain ridges of Cumberland and Westmoreland, and it is now only to be met with in the highest ranges of hills in the central and northern parts of Scotland, in the Hebrides, and in the Orkneys. The mountain ptarmigans are less wary than other grouse; they feed on the tender shoots of heath, the tender shoots of Alpine plants; and are so tame that they seldom are scared by the report of a gun, especially if the snow, when the young birds lie close. COLUMN FOR THE CURIOUS.

THE news of the days is rife with projected public improvements. The good people of Finsbury are to have their park after some twenty years' agitation; but the Finsbury folk were not to be "fobbed off" The Metropolitan Board of Works have just completed the purchase of 120 acres of land on the north side of the New Cattle-market, Holloway, for £45,632 ——indebted to the Seven Sisters'-road, Holloway, for £45,632 ——indebted to be a very low price—out of which the park is forthwith to be formed. Another piece of land at the back of the memorial of Middle-row, Holborn—in Stow's time mostly tenanted by perriving-makers. The question to the Lord Mayor is old as the perriwig. At the south-east corner Sir James Branscomb kept a large house. Early in this year he had been footman to the Earl of Gainsborough, and was knighted when sheriff of London and Middlesex, in 1806. Opposite is the obelisk denoting the site of Holborn Bars; hard by lived Dr. Johnson, at the Golden Anchor; and in Staple Inn, the Holborn front of which, of the time of James I., and like houses around, are among the oldest remains of our London street architecture.

Twenty years or thereabout, have elapsed since the Duke of Wellington was, one day, walking up the narrow part of Park-street, opposite Gloucester House, a carter came along with a country wagon and team of horses. He called to the Duke, who, being very deaf, did not hear the man, who had very nearly, with his wain, thrown down and driven over the hero of a hundred fights. The lane, it will be recollected, is so narrow and the footpath so inconvenient that no person often prefer the roadway; and this was the Duke's choice. The subject rested. It has lately been revived. A few correspondents have complained of being too late for dinner and the opera, because a block in Park-lane, and the evil is about to be remedied; notice being given of application to be made to Parliament in the ensuing Session for a bill to empower the Metropolitan Board of Works to form a Pitt's Head-mews, about 100 feet in length by 40 in width. Should this work be carried out, it will nearly consign the lower portion of Park-lane, from Piccadilly to Grosvenor Gate, to rather its traffic than the last century, when it was called Hyde-park-mews, and was named from James the Second's Secretary, Lord Berkeley, who lived in Berkeley House, No. 1, fronting Piccadilly, was the residence of Lord Eldon, where we picture the evil-Chancellor sitting up late for his bottle of port to Wellington to call upon him, as he had promised, to converse with him upon the administration he had formed (1828) forming; the ex-Chancellor evidently expecting some post, though he was not aware his seat on the woolsack. All this time he never saw the Duke, who "had no communication with him" either personally, by note, letter, by message through any other person, or in any manner whatever"; and some of Lord Eldon's biographers (by-the-way, we wish had to him, too) passed his door constantly on their way to Apsley House and Stratford Place. At length the Duke called, and then came out Lord Eldon's soreness "about the Duke's not calling for a night!" But now the whole Ministry was completed. "We conversed together," adds Lord Eldon, "as it seemed to me we had formed a good deal affected." This is an amusing picture of political grievance. Valuable art-treasures, by Raphael and Sassoferrato, will start cut de sac. In the top house on the west side, the Dowager Marchioness of Clanricarde has a valuable collection of porcelain. Opposite, at No. 4, the Right Hon. Thomas Grenville has his "Grenville Library," which he bequeathed to the British Museum; and, in the same house, Mr. A. A. Dubois has had for days past a few days' notice his fine collection of pictures, including the Lucca "Madonna and Child," by Raphael; portraits by Vandyke, Watteau, Jan Steen, Cuyp, Vandevelde, Reynolds, Wilson, Etty, and Turner. Mr. Munro, at No. 7, added to his "Obituary" last week, was an amateur painter, and his studio in Hamilton-place was filled with the productions of his noisseurs.

The National Gallery is about to be enlarged—a measure far too long delayed. Mr. Wilkins's building has been scandalised as a handsome front to St. Martin's Workhouse, which, however, is now to be taken down, and the site appropriated for the extension of the Gallery. Three stout legislative battles have certified this as the best site for our national pictures, and a Parliament can hardly refuse the powers requisite for the work.

The Lord Chancellor has issued the General Post Office to the effect from St. Martin's-le-Grand, will be taken down Bath-street, until 1843 called Bagnio-court, from the bagnio built here by Turkish merchants, first opened in 1679, and much recruited for use for sweating, being found very good for aches, &c., and approved of by our physicians. The rear of the house has a wooden roof, and was covered with Dutch tiles. Rubbing, shaving, and cupping were added to bathing; but the bath was long been merely a cold bath, though the fashion of the day would seem to have returned to the return to the Turkish bath. This old place will be swept away, but should not be forgotten in our Notes.

Mr. Fergusson has communicated to the Times a very interesting letter descriptive of the Church of the Ascension, a church which he examined during his recent visit to Palestine. Mr. Fergusson is satisfied that the temple is a Crusader's church, built after the sixth Crusade, A.D. 1228; the clustered columns, the arches, and the form of the vault of the roof, preclude the idea of it belonging to the first kingdom of Jerusalem. The roof is a pointed and very interesting arches, of the form prevalent in Italy in the thirteenth century :—

The most beautiful thing in the mosque is the pulpit. According to a Cufic inscription on it, it was originally made for a mosque at Askalon, and finished in A.H. 484, A.D. 1091. Saladin says was brought by him to Jerusalem, and placed in the Aksa at Jerusalem, nearly a century later in date, and neither of the inscriptions agree with this, which is, however, complete, and a beautiful specimen of wood carving I am acquainted with. It also interested me to find that the pulpit of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre was made at the same time for the tomb of Mahomet of Saint mixture of Arabic and Greek, which serve to irritate much more than the Arabic alone. It was also believed to be the temple at Bonnath.

After his survey, Mr. Fergusson has come to the conclusion that on the west side of the court, and shown, or rather made to feel, the impression of Mahomet's foot. The length of this slab was 9 feet 6 in., and not see: it is a very perfectly sculptured impression of a human foot. The survey of Jerusalem, under Mr. Fergusson's care, and his party of sappers, is going on most satisfactorily; and by next summer we may hope to have as perfect a survey of Jerusalem as we have of any English city. Mr. Fergusson considers that the measurements of the localities at Jerusalem was tolerably exhaustive, and I have come to have more confidence than before in the correctness of it as I have written or said with regard to the Holy Places."

Sheridan ruined many characters, but even his honour. When proprietor of Drury-lane Theatre, he turned the theatrical chest to account by depositing it, soon after the burning of the theatre, in 1809, with Mr. John Martin Leake, Garter-king-at-arms, secretary of Fetish-street, as a security for £800. The loan was never repaid, and Mr. Martin's son, Mr. Leake, parted with the contents of the chest to Mr. J. Fatmore, whose son, Mr. Coventry Patmore, has just presented the whole to the form of a reference; and many years after identified as "The Critic." Sheridan's earliest work then growing one of the best. There are several other pieces in the handwriting of R. B. Sheridan and his son Tom; also two letters in the handwriting of Charles Lamb; two or three pantomimes; private letters, receipts, &c., besides pieces with Sheridan's MS. corrections. He must have excelled in this art, to judge from the elaborate correction, pointing, and polishing of his own dramatic pieces.

A "find" of less doubtful interest than the above is reported in the Birmingham Gazette, some dozen important deeds—conveyances, grants, leases, &c.—having been discovered in the office of Birmingham solicitors relating to property adjoining Shakspeare's house in Henley-street, and dating from the middle of the early hear about 1609. John Shakspeare, the father of the poet, was present at the execution of several; and the name of William Shakspeare himself is repeated a few times in none of them.

THE TOWN AND PORT OF NASSAU, NEW PROVIDENCE, BAHAMA ISLANDS.

THE TOWN AND PORT OF NASSAU.

THE Bahama Islands, though smaller and less productive than the rest of the British West Indian colonies, derive a certain political and commercial importance from their position, more especially since the blockade of the Southern States by the Federal navy. The port of Nassau, in the island of New Providence, being at no great distance from the coast of Florida, and commanding the nearest entrance to the navigation of the Gulf of Mexico; with an easy run, moreover, to Bermuda on the one hand, or to Wilmington, South Carolina, on the other, has become a great entrepôt for the blockade-breaking trade. We are indebted to an officer of the 1st West India Regiment, stationed at this place, for a View of the town and harbour, which we have engraved. It is taken from the verandah of the mess-house of the officers of that regiment, and gives a correct general idea of the place and its buildings. The large gate in the foreground is the entrance to the grounds of Government House. The cathedral is in the centre of the View. The two long buildings seen beyond the cottages in the foreground are the barracks. The harbour is very spacious, and formed by the long strip of rocky ground called "Hog Island," on which coal depôts have recently been formed, so as to prevent the quays being occupied by the vast store of coal required for the steamers. There is also a dock, in which a "blockader" is seen undergoing repair. The vessel seen beyond the cathedral tower is the Lizzie, built on the Clyde, an Engraving of which was lately published in our Journal. She was sold the other day at Nassau to a merchant at Havannah. Another blockade-runner is just crossing the bar and coming into port with colours flying, denoting a successful run; while on the horizon we see another just off to "Dixie." These little steamers are painted a light grey, or nearly white, which renders them almost invisible at a distance, and they glide noiselessly over the water; yet it is a common thing, now that the Northerners have made the blockade of Wilmington so rigid, to see the steamers come into the port of Nassau with their masts shot away or their hulls pierced by shot. The population of Nassau is now threefold what it was before the blockade, comprising people of all nations and every class; and many large fortunes have been made, especially by those who engaged early in the traffic; but the crowded state of the town, together with the cases of yellow fever brought here by the shipping, has caused that fearful disease to prevail at Nassau more during the last summer than in previous years. Several cases have occurred among the officers of the garrison, but only two have proved fatal. As might be expected, house rent in the town is enormously high just now; and so is the price of provisions, which are chiefly imported from home, since their export from New York is prohibited, lest they should be sent into the Southern States to supply the Confederate army.

PRIZE PIGEONS AND POULTRY AT THE BIRMINGHAM SHOW.

IN a show of immense excellence, and with no less than 300 pigeon and 1677 poultry entries, the difficulties of choice for illustration are most baffling. Our pigeon group, however, begins with Mr. Shaw's German Lets, which won in class 124, for "any new and distinct variety." The Satinettes were second to them, and the Isabels third. Mr. J. Percival's Turbits, Mr. T. D. Green's Runts, Mr. J. T. Lawrence's Jacobins (yellow), and Mr. S. Shaw's black Trumpeters—a most marvellous pen—form the rest of the group.

The ducks we have selected are Mrs. Seamon's superb pen of Aylesburys, weighing 27 lb., and Mr. S. Shaw's Rouens, which weighed 25 lb., and, like their companions, satisfied to the full the stern poultry laws as to bill and plumage.

The cinnamon and buff Cochin-China chickens are the property of Captain Heaton, and won in a good class, as the Captain also did with his older pen. The Crève Cœur chickens belong to Mr. Joseph Harrison, of Blackpool; and, although there were only ten entries in the two classes, this "hobgoblin-looking fowl"—anent which Mrs. Ferguson Blair further adds, in her "Henwife," that "it is perfection for the table, and the eggs are very large"—will ere long have raised its split-heart comb on many a British dunghill. All the above-named specimens won first prizes.

His Excellency Sir Henry Storks arrived at Malta on the night of Nov. 29, in her Majesty's ship Pyche, from Marseilles. On Wednesday morning the Chief Secretary to Government, Sir Victor Houlton, repaired on board to take his Excellency's commands, and in the course of the morning the secretary to the Roman Catholic Bishop also waited upon his Excellency to compliment him in the name of the Bishop of Malta. Sir Henry Storks landed at noon, under a salute from the town, and was received at the Custom House landing-place by a guard of honour, as well as by Major-General Ridley, the Acting Governor, and the heads of the military and civil departments. The ceremony of administering the oaths was performed by Sir Antonio Micallef, K.C.M.G., the highest judicial functionary in the island, and they were repeated by his Excellency in a remarkably firm and audible voice, the Royal commission having previously been read by the Chief Secretary. In the evening his Excellency dined with General Ridley, and afterwards went to the Opera, the house being unusually well attended by a large and fashionable audience. The next day a popular address was presented to the new Governor.

MEMBERS OUT OF PARLIAMENT.

The sub-Ministerial element has been remarkably prevalent. Five distinguished subordinate officers of the Government—distinguished in their own persons, subordinate in their offices—have been, at one time or another, exercising their official systems by inhalation of the popular atmosphere. Not to say it profanely, there is at least of them have a considerable extent been soaking justification, and drawing up their credit with their constituents. Really, for the sake of the perplexities and the curious necessity for making "pegs" on which to represent ideas which surround these gentlemen when they are subjected to electoral assimilation, it would be well if some one would see that which excuses members of the Government from committees in private business of the House were extended to their requirement of extra-Parliamentary utterances. An enormous expenditure of facilities and labour would thus be saved, and a species of moral rack, unlikely to be found in the Statute Book, which much mars week afterwards at least. The case of a Minister for the constituencies number five or six hundred; but when a Member of the Government who has no right to any policy but that of the chief of his department, and who never can speak strictly for himself, finds himself carried before the electors of a populous borough, and, with in tens and twelves of thousands, his warmest sympathies must be one of at least temporary regret that, in a moment of enthusiasm, he ever put his name at the end of a sum of the people.

To a great extent, in this condition is Mr. Layard; and one can the abode of a dentist must be when he comes before the voters of Southwark with all the aroma of the Foreign Office about him, and less to defend Lord Russell's policy as tested by its results in the last Session of Parliament. At the same time, let it be understood that a man whose behalf one could talk in a strain ad interos upon the public men of the time, of his official and Parliamentary years and his administrative calibre. Such a man requires help and sympathy. Gifted with what we must call an unhappy audacity of speech, he can phrase without grave danger to our idea in the matter—a self-belief by no means unwarranted, and an unconsciousness of the world's opinion of his fine qualities, over-hampered, conciliating, and, above all, necessary nerve to meet and compel by his influence—up of the primitive passions of the most popular, and therefore the most unreasonable and unregulative, of audiences cannot be very pretty to see, to contemplate, or to describe. Nor is the prevailing sensation of his mind, however slightly he may realise it in words, that he is in the doubt behind in the rush of the confidence which inspires him to go in and win. Then, too, he has some advantages of the Government, and we never heard of any willing or grasping of teeth therefore. Since the time when Sir William Courtenay, was a chairman of a wild Radical, trapped, taken to Court, and made a Cabinet Minister; and, in a less degree, Sir William Molesworth, it has been the belief that they made the Minister, the principle which he thus represented seemed to have been recognised and adopted. So Mr. Layard is not threatened by the Government because he is not a Government man. Lord John does not discover that his pretensions as an out-and-out Liberal are endangered by showing a leaning towards such little Ministerial pickings as receiverships and Crown benefices. Nor does Mr. Layard, all this will Layard, when he is not in office, and when, in other night, came away unscathed, Denmark and the Duchies notwithstanding.

Although Mr. Layard has heard that Pontefract was a very exacting borough, or that any of its members have been made to pay for their return in the shape of moral castigation of its constituency, still one could not but sympathise with Mr. Children when he first came before its electors in the guise of a Lord of the Admiralty. Just as much seemed the official to the landsman, when they undertake to go through the ordeal of an interchange of ideas and opinions with the people, so much did it seem that they are expected to perform a feat which is comparable only to the legendary feat of the Davenports. They present themselves bound in a series of apparently inextricably-knotted ropes, out of which they are to force themselves or to glide by some magical process. Mr. Children, although from the first letter of grace has conducted himself with so much boldness as to be almost a Radical in the best sense and practical ability—that he is about the last member whom any Ministry would dare to see placed in a position of embarrassment. His mode of action as a private member of Parliament has always been so really candid and straightforward—on their conduct, and to treat them independently of any other consideration, that we cannot but think that the case of Lord Clarence Paget in the election of Deal involved a kind of loyal feeling. Perhaps, and that been the case, Mr. Children would not have been part in the practised hands of the Whig scheme for the better ecentricities and shortcomings that ever sprang from the metemsychosis which he underwent. In such a case Mr. Children matters, and have addressed to the larger and more general electors as he addressed the Pontefract men in all probability the recognise in the comprehensive Liberalism of the Ministry.

In this connection, we cannot but think that the profusion of ventured to lament the loss of Mr. Cobden and the Manchester men. After all, strictly speaking, he has no representative in the House, no accountant of the department, and might have been well spared on occasion and outfitted himself for the Continent to look after the glories of the Secretary of the Admiralty is an unconscious though brilliant disciple.

In the address which Mr. Bright has recently delivered, when dealing with the subject of educational examinations, he has strongly condemned the fitness which belongs to his office. The practice and in his speech grave and authoritative; and in the other hand, in addition to his constituents, had no need to have recourse to special pleading; there was nothing in their mutual relations to cause him to gloze and fawn; and he had no pecuniary or probable that one of the Staffordshire voters that listened to Sir Robert's robust irregularities of speech, to his curative metaphors, and his singular art of sentence-construction, knew or cared whether he or had condemned an equal number of Orangemen and Roman Catholics on the floor of the drumhead court-martial, by way of dealing out equal justice on the rioters at Belfast. No doubt, therefore, when he asked their sympathies for him in relation to the rough ordeal he had gone through, while endeavouring to make anybody in or connected with Ireland know why he of all men should have been selected the medium of an anecdote, was very heartily bestowed. Enough has been introduced to show that he had acquired some knowledge of the men and inspiration which induced him to set about to study the question of the Irish Establishment, and to consider the question in a low-backed car. It is to be hoped that, in the future, the results of his diligence may be to the duties of his office, he will not omit the very obvious qualification of catching the scrout.

MUSIC.

Handel's oratorio, though of a very slight description, has been produced at Covent Garden. It is an operetta in one act, called "The Bride of Song," and is the work of Henry Farmer and the music by Jules Benedict. It is a mere trifle, intended to serve as a leve de rideau, but answers agreeably enough, as containing a few strains of pleasing melody and two or three pretty ballads, duets, and trios. But we regret that Mr. Benedict, one of the greatest dramatic composers in Europe, should have so employed (unemployed, we would almost say) his talent. When such a man makes a contribution to the English musical stage, it should be a work of importance, and worthy his name and a fitting companion to the "Gipsy's Warning" and the "Lily of Killarney."

A debutante of much promise has appeared at Her Majesty's Theatre in Miss Fenton Galton, a niece of Miss Poole. She "first" formed the part of Amina in "La Sonnambula" on Monday last, and has evidently a favourable reception. She is very young—only sixteen, we are told—and possesses a fine voice, which she is—a mere child!—is of course a novice as an actress, and her style is consequently more than a child as a singer; her intonation is correct, and her execution, though pure and sweet, she uses it with the taste and skill of a well-educated singer. Her shakes and trills were warmly applauded; and it is evident that, with matured powers, she will be a great favourite with the public and the performers. But she has come before the public too early, and had better continue to pursue assiduously the studies necessary to form an artiste.

The Liverpool Philharmonic Society has been the first among the great provincial choral bodies to produce Mr. Henry Smart's cantata, "The Fathers of Dunkerron," the great success of which at the last Birmingham festival was duly recorded in our columns. It was performed at their subscription concert, on the 29th ult., before a crowded audience, and was received with the greatest applause. The solo singers were Mdme. Rudersdorff, Mr. Cummings, and Mr. Santley, and the conductor, Mdme. Arabella Goddard, conducted the performance. At the same concert her usual success. She played Mendelssohn's rondo in E flat, Borgia," and the same composer's variations on "Lucrezia Floro," among other pieces.

Mr. Aguilar's last matinée of pianoforte music, at his residence last week, was highly interesting, and attended by a musical company. The programme (which was as follows) presented a selection of great and varied excellence:—Trio, pianoforte, violin, and violoncello (Schumann); Caprice—Aguilar; "Evening" and "Eve" (Lock) (two romances); Pianoforte solo—"Le Bal" and "Le Jardin Clochette" (Mendelssohn); Pianoforte solo, E minor—Weber; Beaming" (Schumann); Pianoforte solo—Aguilar; "The Blue Bells"—Aguilar; Passe Pied and Gigue—J. S. Bach; "The Minstrel at Sunset" and "Miss Bulbul"—Aguilar.

The King of Bavaria entertains the highest opinion of the genius of Richard Wagner, whom he loads with favours. His Majesty has, it is said, resolved to found an operatic school at Munich for the instruction of singers, under the direction of Wagner's direction. His opera, "Der Fliegender Hollander" (the Flying Dutchman), will be produced at the Court Theatre.

Mdlle. Titiens has begun an engagement at Hamburg (her native place) with Beethoven's "Fidelio."

Miss Agnes Zimmermann, who is now on a professional tour in Germany, has lately had the honour to perform at the Court of Hanover, in presence of the King and Queen and several members of the Royal family. She was invited to Hanover by the King, and again next season to perform at one of the State concerts. Miss Zimmermann played at the Gewandhaus Verein in Hanover, at Bochum, at Cologne, and several other towns in Rhenish Prussia. She has received offers to perform at the Philharmonic and Royal Academy of Music, when she returned from her native music-lovers.

THE THEATRES.

Drury Lane was crowded on Monday to witness the tragedy of "Macbeth," being one of the nights on which Miss Faucit, Mr. Phelps, and Mr. Creswick, the only actors who have ambitions wife, the guilty Thane, and the noble avenger alike of his dethroned father and his country's wrongs. That the audience were fully sensible of the excellence of the performance was evidenced by the intense attention to the progress of the scene, and every line of it from the lips of the actors who have essayed. The finished elocution of each was evidently appreciated by the audience. The Lady Macbeth was, indeed, the cause of the attention, which was equally general and profound. This fact must convince managers that the language of a play is of equal importance with the acting of the part. Miss Faucit's readings were those which are so needful for the poetic drama, and when justice shall be done to the living poet by those who have the will and the power to do it, Miss Faucit will be but an adequate supply of original dramas will vindicate the poet's character of dramatist. Miss Faucit is equal to that of any previous period. A movement was made here the same evening for the performance of "The Poet's Revenge," Shakspeare Memorial," an address in favour of Mrs. Herman Vezin, Mr. Edmund Phelps; and that on Friday, by the audience. Mrs. Vezin appeared for the first time, with power and feeling; interpreting the poetry with grace and taste, judgment, and telling on the audience with great power, the emphasis that fully impressed their meaning on the hearer. The applause was frequent and hearty, and the fair reciter received from the scene amidst acclamations. On subsequent evenings, similar subscriptions were announced to be given at Drury Lane, on Tuesday, written by Mr. James Bruton, was spoken by Mr. Sidney Smith; on Wednesday, "Shylock," by Mr. Sawyer, was spoken by Mr. Henry Marston; that on Thursday, written by Mr. Shirley Brooks, was spoken by Mr. Edmund Phelps; and that on Friday, by Mr. J. Hain Friswell, was spoken by Mr. Creswick. This evening, an address written by Mr. Robert Buchanan, will be delivered by Mr. Walter Lacey.

Mr. Gardner Coyne, the Irish comedian, has obtained a starring engagement at Sadler's Wells, and appeared in "The Irish Emigrant," "The Limerick Boy," and "Used Up," with that fun and vivacity and broad humour which have always rendered him a favourite with the public. In this character Mr. Fechter originally made his reputation in London, and he still performs it with a picturesque power that will secure its further popularity.

A new drama has been produced at the Surrey, called "Mandrin." It is of the nature of a melodramatic romance, very complicated in its plot and various in its incidents, but completely successful. It is to take to the action of which Mandrin himself is the principal element. Mr. J. Fernandez, as the hero Mandrin, the robber of the mountains, the sovereign ruffian; and Miss Pauncefort, as Margarets, his deserted mistress, acted with great dramatic force.

The new drama is a work of stage-art in its way, and is artistically realised by the well-practised actors engaged in it. "The Orange Girl" has proved attractive, and will now carry the management triumphantly up to Christmas.

The presentation of prizes to successful competitors of the 4th Tower Hamlets by Lady De Hegtuon took place on Thursday week in St. Thomas's Hall, Hackney, in the presence of Colonel M'Murdo, who made a telling speech. Among the prizes were a handsome silver tankard and medal, presented by Colonel Sir R. Jardine, and given by Corporal Hurst; two prizes, presented by Colonel Sir R. de Hegtuon, won by Private Baines and by Colour-Sergeant Asplinet. A prize, presented by C.S. Butler, Esq., M.P., and gained by Colour-Sergeant Asplinet. There were numerous other prizes, consisting of watches, tankards, and ten services.

The prizes competed for during the present year by the members of the 37th Middlesex were distributed to the different winners on Saturday night, by Colonel M'Murdo, in the Music Hall, Store-street. Colonel M'Murdo, who was received with vehement cheering, said one of his duties consisted with volunteers was to give an account of the efficiency of the corps, and he could say with sincerity that the 37th had maintained their character for efficiency and progress. The challenge gold badge and medal, open to the whole corps, which in 1863 was won by Private Marks, in 1862 by Colour-Sergeant Bacon, and in 1861 by Quartermaster-Sergeant Hayes, in 1860 by Private Pearce, this year was awarded to Corporal Gould. The same gentleman received also the prize in the "gold-medal squad." The silver medal of the corps, open to second-class men," was awarded to Corporal Day.

The annual competition for the company prizes presented by the officers of the Irish volunteers in the metropolis was known as the Irish Rifle Association. Results aimed at money in the aggregate,600, the prizes consisted of a number of valuable articles, and the first prize was a silver cup. The following are the names in the first class of the winners of the respective silver medals awarded to the best 20 in each company:—Company, Private W. Bowman; B Company, Private J. Donnelly; C Company, Ensign R. H. Chatcock; F Company, Private F. G. Cooper; G Company, Sergeant H. Crespin. The battalion gold medal was carried off by Lieutenant J. Godfrey. This regiment, which numbers about 700 effective, is in a most satisfactory condition. A state of affairs only owing, it is to the attention of the gallant Colonel, the Marquis of Donegall, to its introduction and its military organisation.

The presentation of the prizes won in a recent competition amongst the 1st Surrey were distributed to the victors on Thursday week, in the handsome drill-shed of the head-quarters, Kingston. The new uniform of this battalion with ornamental accoutrements in gold and silver plate to the value of more than £400, the prizes for the competition were distributed to the successful competitors. The General presented the prizes was undertaken by Lady Pollock, the wife of Sir Frederick Pollock, Bart., Colonel of the corps, who, after the presentation of the Pollock challenge cup, of the value of fifty guineas, given by General Pollock, and won by Private Butler. The 1st Surrey Rifle Association challenge cup, for the competition of Colonel Macdonald, was won by Private F. Wishart. The ladies' challenge cup, of the value of fifty guineas, by Sergeant-Major Smith. Lieutenant Buckle's challenge cup, by Private J. J. Curtis; Captain Company's challenge cup, of thirty guineas' value, Private J. Z. Macnee; Macdonald's prize of ten guineas, by Sergeant E. E. Buckle; a silver cup of the value of twenty guineas, by Sergeant E. E. Buckle; a silver cup of Macnee. Prizes were also given by Dr. Griffiths, Major Irvine, the officers of the Brixton company, Ensign Goodson, Quartermaster H. West, Sergeant Chisholme, Private Hewitt, Private Wilson, Sergeant Cooper, by the battalion, by the Surrey Rifle companies. The prizes not already mentioned are Private E. D. Brown, Private Wishart, Corporal Lieutenant Buckle, Sergeant Ingram, Private Tully, Private Wishart, Private T. Wheeler, Corporal T. G. Mill, Privates John Tully, J. B. Mann, Hewett, and Corporal Nixon.

The volunteers of Dover, Folkestone, and Hythe were inspected at Folkestone, on the 16th ult., by Colonel Leard. Fault was found with the battalion drill, but the company drill was good.

The silver challenge cup which have been presented seven-twenty-five Counties by the Prince of Wales were both competed for on Monday. At Court were thirty candidates for the Kingston cup, and thirty entries, but preliminary shooting gave reduced the former to twenty-four, and the latter to only six. The highest score was made by Private Dyer, of Emsworth, to whom the cup was awarded—one fifty-two points. The Kingston cup presented by the 1st Oxfordshire by Lieutenant-Colonel Bowyer, which is constituted solely by members of the corps, and which Corporal Fox has carried off the prize.—The next Battley. Sergeant Doyle, Balliol College, carried Oxford Sergeant Wyatt, secretary of the third Oxfordshire Rifles, took place on Monday week. Sergeant Alcock's squad were the winners, scoring 1,000 points.

The 2nd Lancashire (St. Helen's) Engineers were inspected on the 11th, by Colonel Gordon, R.E. Though a comparatively young corps, their movements called forth the praise of the inspecting officer, who, however, censured them that they had not yet a good deal to learn. St. Helen's possesses a battalion of riflemen as well as engineers, and on Saturday's practice of the members of the 5th (Salford) Lancashire, assembled on the range of the regiment at Clifton Moss (Salford) Lancashire, assembled challenge cup. The cup must be won three years before it becomes the property of the winner. Quartermaster Sergeant Jones was the victor.

The Isle of Man has this year established a rifle association. The inhabitants of prizes was the Governor's cup, took place at Douglas on is a member of the Queen's Own Yeomanry Rifles. The first meeting for the Man cup, the holder of which was also entitled to compete for the Prince of Wales's prize was held at Winchester on Wednesday and Thursday.

The volunteers in Victoria, Australia, have shown extraordinary zeal. Out of a total force of 7,000 men more than 2700 have gone through the regular course of class-firing. The New Zealand Rifle Association, based upon the English National Rifle Association, held its fourth annual meeting at Sydney, in September. The meeting was not so well attended as on previous years; but it passed off with great spirit.

WILLS AND BEQUESTS.

The will of the Hon. Hannah Jane Cochrane, widow, of Sussex-square, was proved in the Prerogative Court of Canterbury by the executors appointed being her sons Robert Alexander Cochrane, formerly Lieutenant-Colonel 89th Regt. The testatrix has bequeathed to her son Robert one piece in the Hetton Colliery, Durham, and her dividend from the Australian Mortgage, Land, and Investment Company, Limited, and to her son Edward also to her sharing pecuniary bequeste to her sons Basil and daughter Mrs. Ruth, a legacy of £500; bequests to servants of £300; and to her children, nieces, cousins, and other relatives and friends, sisters-in-law and to her nephews, sisters-in-law, and to her nephews, Robert Duncan, M.D., £200. THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

No. 1292.—VOL. XLV. SATURDAY, DECEMBER 17, 1864. WITH A SUPPLEMENT, FIVEPENCE

UTILISATION OF SEWAGE.

MATTERS intrinsically mean and repulsive sometimes affect so largely the well-being of communities as to assume an aspect of dignity. What more insignificant than the locust? Yet locusts, when organised, as they occasionally are, into an infinitely multitudinous host, and ravaging, as they sometimes will, vast breadths of country, command the affrighted attention of mankind. What topic more uninviting than sewage? Yet, as our own experience shows, it may rise into one of national importance. Hygiene, in certain stages of a people's development, becomes the most urgent of the practical sciences. It is so at this moment in the United Kingdom. The rapid aggregation of men into large masses consequent on the expansion of manufacturing industry, and, perhaps, the natural but mistaken modes in which law has intervened for the preservation of the public health, have combined to present for solution one of the most difficult and pressing problems of the age, and one which the physical and social interests of the nation forbid our putting aside on mere æsthetic grounds.

Happily, the difficulty which has arisen is susceptible of highly-satisfactory treatment, illustrates in the most interesting manner the provisions made by nature for preserving the equilibrium of conflicting agencies, and offers to human ingenuity a most remunerative opportunity for the exercise of its resources. It is required to convert what, under ill management, is as destructive of animal life as a pestilence into what, under wise management, may supply vegetable life with element which will double for us its fruitfulness; to get rid of an incalculable amount of disease by the same process which will indefinitely increase the production of wholesome food; to transform an all-pervading nuisance into a benefit. The conditions requisite to work out this desirable result are found in the ordinations of Nature. By making our arrangements in conformity with her laws, we may exchange what we would fain rid ourselves of for what we urgently want, and transmute into a precious boon that which, as we use it, is an insidious poison. The only demand made upon us is to contrive the mechanical means whereby sewage shall be conveyed to its proper destination at a cost somewhat below the advantages which the land will return for it. This done, the problem will be solved.

Hitherto, it must be confessed, our ingenuity has been perversely sufficient. We looked upon sewage as so much waste which it concerned us to cast away from the immediate neighbourhood of populous towns, whatever might thereafter become of it. We turned it into our rivers, streams, and watercourses, where it could do no manner of good, but only taint them with pollution. We made them sewers, and they ceased to be waters. killed their fish, and caused them to exhale pestilential odours. The remedy, being the wrong one, has become worse than the disease. Already municipalities are seeking at the hands of the Secretary of State legal powers to prohibit the mischief. This metropolis, as is well known, is constructing gigantic works, at an immense cost, to intercept its sewage from the upper portion of the Thames and to discharge it into the river so much nearer its mouth as will prevent its being brought back again by flowing tides. No one can fairly complain. It is mainly through successive mistakes that man blunders into knowledge. We are clearly right in our conclusion that our rivers and natural watercourses must cease to be used as drains; and, no doubt, it is well to act up to our light thus far—more especially as what we are seeking to do now is in itself preparatory to what may be further done hereafter. "Necessity is the mother of invention," and when law shall make it necessary to dispose of the sewage of great towns otherwise than by draining it into the rivers we shall be compelled to entertain more earnestly the alternative of distributing it over the soil.

We have, however, advanced thus far, at the very least, than the preceding words would seem to imply. Baron Liebig, the prince of agricultural chemists, has laboured hard, and at length with success, to turn the attention of scientific men to the immense value of house drainage as a fertilising agent. Here and there experiments have been made, each varying but, on the whole, encouraging results, to determine the practicability, not as a matter of engineering, which is simple enough, but as a matter of economy, of applying the sewage of towns to the purposes of tillage. Two Committees of the House of Commons have collected evidence on the subject—one presided over by Lord Robert Montagu and the other by Mr. Brady—and, whatever may be the merits of their respective reports, the mass of information they have published has been of great value. The effect has been to infuse into a much-neglected and very primâ facie repulsive subject all the interest which a probable prospect of large pecuniary gain was sure to excite. Engineers and contractors are competing with one another for the sewage of the metropolis as keenly as for a new line of railway. The Metropolitan Board of Works have specified the number of Messrs. Napier and Hope, and will apply for an Act next Session authorising them to complete the bargain. The Council of the City Corporation impeaches the transaction as an improvident one for the ratepayers, and contends that under what appears the contents of the sewers, which a year or two ago everyone was puzzled to get rid of, may be made to bring in from a million to two millions sterling. The question of the utilisation of sewage, therefore, is not likely hereafter to languish for want of the attention. Our sole remaining observation is the one of future companies being deposited with a view to catch the sunny influence of Parliament to warm them into actual existence, and speculators surveying with keen eyes the new element of wealth.

The most economical mode of applying sewage to the soil remains a subject of earnest consideration. A gentleman of public, however, which professes to have investigated the matter may be classed into two schools—those who would flood limited portions of land with the liquid manure, and thereby convert sandy wastes and marshy districts into rich pasturage, and those who would irrigate more sparingly and convey the fertilising agent over a much more extensive area. High authorities may be found on each side. We shall not presume to pronounce our opinion on a question upon which doctors differ. It will take much longer and more varied experience than any we have yet at command, we imagine, to settle the dispute. Science has not yet discovered all the conditions necessary to carry the experiment to its highest attainable point of success. Meanwhile, we apprehend there can scarcely remain a reasonable doubt that, under either system, the works judiciously planned can fail of being remunerative, though in neither, perhaps, to the extent anticipated. The bill to be introduced by the Metropolitan Board of Works, as it will be vigorously opposed by the City, will have to pass through the ordeal of searching and severe investigation; and the data upon which its provisions are founded, and the calculations upon which the project of Messrs. Napier and Hope are based, will be tested by the keenest scientific sagacity. We can readily leave the question of more or less profit to the guardians of the people's purse, contenting ourselves for the present with the prospect held out to us that, whether the pecuniary gain be more or less, the sanitary advantage is tolerably sure, and must prove enormous. To give to the earth, which craves it, what we now divert into the streams, which are sickened by it, will be a salutary change whatever may turn out to be its money value.

The discovery—for it is practically equivalent to a discovery—has been made none too soon. Many things have contributed to raise the price of meat in this country, some of which may be expected to be permanent, notwithstanding the present glut. The wide diffusion of competence, consequent on free trade, and the great multiplication of works of industry, have opened new sources of highly remunerative employment to a large proportion of the working population, and have brought them, as buyers, into the meat market with ready cash and keen appetites. Disease had already thinned the numbers of the farmers' live stock, before the present year of drought sorely diminished the means of subsistence. We cannot, it is true, calculate upon any immediate advantage from the utilisation of sewage; but it will be some consolation to us in passing through a protracted stage of high prices to look forward with confidence to a future when temporary scarcity will be followed by lasting and increasing abundance. Nay, it is by no means improbable that the deficiency in the supply of animal food, in connection with the increased demand for it, will stimulate effort in every p rt of the country to make the new agent of fertilisation available as speedily as possible, and assist in bearing down the prejudices and overcoming the vis inertiæ with which all novelties have to contend in their experimental stage.

What posterity a hundred years hence will think of our past practices in regard to this matter is a curious but somewhat humiliating subject for speculation. Probably the whole process of applying filth to tilth will have become so simplified in method, or so subject to daily observation, as to be useful in result as to make it difficult for them to realise the fact that their ancestors of only a century back, to whom they will have to ascribe such wonderful mechanical inventions and such gigantic monuments of engineering skill, could have been so blind to what is to be to them so obvious as the beneficent arrangements of Nature as to befoul their rivers with the waste which might have renovated the exhausted soil. It is only, however, an additional illustration of the common propensity of man to miss what is close to his feet in his absorbing search for the distant for what is afar off. It is no great credit, after all, to one who is on the hill-top to smile at the roundabout ways taken by others who have not the advantage of his elevation for an outlook. Unquestionably, lack of knowledge has led us into many blunders. There is good reason to hope that we shall not render ourselves liable to the further and heavier reproach that, when at last light dawned upon us, we refused to walk in it. To this age, we trust, future generations will look back with unmingled admiration as the one which, at that in which their predecessors will be content to accept the lesson of the evils that may be avoided and the benefits that may be secured by a simple observance of the laws of Nature.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.

M. Mocquard, the Emperor's private secretary, died yesterday week. His Majesty addressed two telegraphic despatches, one to M. Mocquard, son, and the other to Madame Mocquard, on the death of her husband. The former was as follows:—"I was absent to leave for Paris, to bid adieu to your father, when the melancholy news reached me. My grief is equal to your own." The other was in these terms:—"I am in the deepest affliction at the death of your father-in-law. He was my friend. His loss is no public misfortune; but for me it is irreparable. I assured to his children." M. Mocquard was buried on Monday. The funeral was attended by a large number of Ministers and men of note. Marshal Vaillant, the chief of the Imperial household, pronounced a funeral oration on behalf of the Emperor. M. Troplong read in the Conseil-d'Etat the same speech, in which he paid a tribute to the memory of M. Mocquard in the name of the Senate and of the press. A monument to M. Mocquard will be found in the Montmartre column.

According to the Patrie, the Government intend to persist in their scheme of undertaking several great public works. That journal says a staff of engineers employed by the Minister of Public Works to report on the matter have given in their opinion that they have framed an estimate which will prove a little startling to the taxpayers, out of whose pockets the money is to be extracted for carrying out effect the terms of the recommendation. The items enumerated are for canals and rivers, harbours and embankments, roads and bridges, and hydraulic works, at a cost of about £17,200,000 sterling.

A large number of Paris tradesmen have addressed a memorial to the Emperor praying for a compensation, or for some other means of affording relief from the difficulties caused by the high rate of discount charged at the Bank of France.

The report of the Prefect of the Seine contains the following details on improvements in Paris:—

The prolongation of the Rue de Rivoli, with the approaches to the Louvre, to the Hotel de Ville, and the Boulevard Sebastopol (right bank), cost 21,397,627 fr. The Boulevard Sebastopol (left bank) cost 5,700,000 fr. out of 42,187,726. In the outlay cannot by the extension of the limits of Paris, the religious edifices have cost 4,000,000 fr. The municipal schools, new buildings to 34,894,1934; and the streets, highways, and bridges, including new lines and intersections, lighting, drainage, and paving, 42,000,000 francs, to 99,328,076. On Jan. 1, 1860, at the moment of the extension of the limits of the city, the streets were disconnected in the eastern districts; one hundred and forty-four houses will be placed in the isolated districts, the number in each will be more than tripled, as the number of 2564, before the annexations, will be increased to 11,000. The drainage and water supply must in for a long share of the votes for public works. The length of water-pipes laid down in 1864 was 67,000 kilometres (five-eighths of a mile), of which 37,000 were in old Paris, and 24,000 in the new quarters. The reservoir of Montsouris, which will contain 100,000 cubic metres of spring water and 50,000 metres from the Marne, is partly tenanted. The reservoir of Belleville, which will receive 14,000 cubic metres of spring water and 25,000 from the Marne, is also near completion. One of the upper compartments is already supplied with the Seine water by the Courcelles works.

Various statues have been placed in the galleries of paintings at the Louvre, in imitation of the famous Tribune at Florence.

It has hitherto been the custom in the schools of Paris to reward the children most distinguished during the week for their good conduct and application by decorating them with a cross more or less resembling that of the Legion of Honour, and attached by a red ribbon. At the end of the week the cross was returned and awarded to some other of the pupils. The Minister of Public Instruction, considering that such imitation of the cross of the Legion of Honour was a disparagement, has notified to all schoolmasters to employ for the future a simple cross of four branches, without enamel or red ribbon.

In announcing a variety of new postal arrangements for facilitating the delivery of letters, and for the better lettering the position of the Post-office employés, the Moniteur states that the increase in the number of letters since the reform of the system in 1847 has been from 126 millions to 300 millions in a year. About the same augmentation has also taken place in the value of the sums of money sent through the Post-office, and in the number of newspapers, books, and parcels sent. In spite of the reduction of the rates of postage, the receipts also have continually augmented, and have risen from 60 millions of francs in 1847 to 72 millions in 1863.

The Court of Rouen has given its decision in the case of M.M. Cheron and Claudon, both prosecuted for illegally publishing electoral correspondences to provincial newspapers. The Court confirms the judgment delivered in this case by the Tribunal of First Instance.

The Soleil Public of Lyons announces the discovery in the registers of the Sainte-Croix Church in that city for the years 1638-9 of a marriage act signed by Molière. His signatures are to be found, however, very rare.

Berger, the shepherd statuary, has for the cathedral of Missen four statues of the great orator-prelates of the seventeenth century—Bossuet, Fenelon, Fléchier, and Massillon. They are said to be admirably executed.

Wednesday's Moniteur publishes the treaty of commerce concluded between France and Switzerland. It gives also the text of an Imperial decree promulgating a convention agreed on between the Governments of France and Switzerland for the police of the forests bordering on the two countries.

An Imperial decree orders that from the 1st of January next the transfer duties imposed by the law of 1857 on foreign securities shall be levied upon half the capital represented by shares and upon the whole amount of obligations.

The Government has resolved that foreign spirits rectified in England shall be admitted into France on the same terms as spirits distilled in England.

Advices from Mexico, published in the New York papers, state that on the 10th of October the Emperor Maximilian and suite took possession of the town, which had been evacuated on the previous night. Alvarez had defeated the Imperial forces and was marching on Acapulco.

SPAIN.

After a Cabinet Council at Madrid yesterday week, Senor Llorente, Foreign Minister, presented his resignation, the rest of the Cabinet not being able to agree with him in the introduction of reforms which fall in the next Session of the Cortes. Senor Antonio Benavides has been nominated in his place, and has taken the oath of allegiance.

The Government has determined upon reinforcing the Pacific squadron by the iron-clad frigate Numancia, just finished in France, which is completely fitted out, and has started for her destination.

ITALY.

The debate in the Senate on the transfer of the capital, and matters connected with it, have been unanimously by a speech of General Cialdini, which appears to have established for the General a reputation for oratory previously unsuspected. General Cialdini supported the transfer of the capital on a strategic point of view. The "compromise," he said, "was possible between Austria and Italy. The passes of the Alps were in the hands of Austria. Napoleon and della Marmora, the Premier, stated that he shared the views expressed by General Cialdini. In the sitting of yesterday week the bill for the transfer was passed by 184 against 47 votes. Two members abstained from voting.

The Senate has passed the bill which is to transfer the Court of Cassation from Milan to Turin, likewise that which is to make a money compensation for the latter city for the loss it sustains in ceasing to be the seat of Government.

The French military tribunal in Rome has finished the trial of the four brigands charged with the murder of two French gendarmes. One of the prisoners, named Graziani, a Neapolitan, was condemned to death, and a second to three years' hard labour. The two others were acquitted.

AUSTRIA.

The Lower House of the Reichsrath determined on Sunday to continue the increased taxation until the end of March, 1865. A petition from General Langlevere was laid before the Chamber in which he prayed to be set at liberty. In the spring of 1863 Langlevere took refuge on Austrian soil, and was "interned"—in other words, made prisoner.

Letters from Vienna confirm the statement that the Government proposes to effect considerable reduction in the military expenditure. The reduction is not to be in the ordinary Budget of the Minister of War, but on the Extraordinary Budget, as the Government desires to bring the effective down to a normal peace footing.

DENMARK.

We stated last week that a deputation had been presented to King Christian, at Kildeng, by a deputation of North-Schleswigers. It has now be added that, in reply to the address, the King expressed his joy at the great loyalty displayed by North Schleswig people, but stated that, as the province had been ceded, he hoped the Schleswigers would now live in peace with gentlemen. Before the arrival of the deputation were received they had to lay aside the Danish colours they were wearing, as the King would only receive them as Schlewigers.

RUSSIA.

An attempt is to be made, as stated in a portion of our Impression las. week, to replenish the exhausted treasury of the Russian empire by the construction of a new lottery loan of about £4,000,000, at the rate of five per cent. The transaction is to be completed by the 24th inst.

The St. Petersburg journals publish official documents which show that the Government has been for some time back engaged in the preparation of measures which are to be completed immediately after the Coronation of Poland. All offices of any importance are to be filled henceforth by Russians; Russian peasant colonies are to be established; the Polish Catholic clergy are to be placed under the strictest surveillance; and an active propaganda is to be set going on behalf of the orthodox Church. A letter from the Archbishop Nazianzeff, addressed to the Government, recommends the gradual removal of the minor nobility from Poland, and suggests a large deputation to that country.

Recent returns show that the number of fairs held annually in the government of Tobolsk, in Siberia, is 163. The value of the merchandise brought to these fairs amounts to £400,021 roubles (£62 roubles are about equal to a pound sterling.), and the sales effected to 3,384,686 roubles. The fair of Irbit is the most important one. The merchandise brought there amounts to 2,662,000 roubles, and the sales to 2,341,000 roubles.

AMERICA.

By the arrival of the Nova Scotian and the Etna we have intelligence from New York to the 3rd inst.

The chief news brought is the announcement that there had been a severe engagement between the hostile armies in Tennessee. The Federal General Schofield reports that, on the afternoon of the 30th ult., two corps of General Hood's army attacked Franklin, but were repulsed at all points by him, with the loss, on the enemy's side, of 5000 or 6000 men, including 1000 prisoners; while the Federals lost was only a quarter of that sustained by their assailants. Nevertheless, General Schofield retired during the night from Franklin towards a position three miles south of Nashville; and on the following morning the victorious and remaining Federals were closely followed by the defeated and pursuing Confederates. Heavy skirmishing was progressing and a general engagement was expected while Federal reinforcements were arriving at Nashville, where the forts and intrenchments were manned by the garrison and the Government labourers, who had been armed.

The exact position of Sherman in Georgia is still uncertain. According to some accounts he had been repulsed in an attempt to cross the Ogeechee River, while others state that his main army had succeeded in crossing that river, and, avoiding Augusta and all the other large towns, was making the best of its way to the seacoast. The Confederates were mainly concentrating their forces, and were bent on the destruction of the invading army. It was said that they had defeated the advance cavalry of Sherman in an attempt to open communication with Beaufort. The Times correspondent states that the defeat of Sherman's cavalry took place on the Savannah River. It was reported that General Burnside, with 20,000 men, had sailed from Fort Monroe for the purpose of landing at some point on the Southern coast, and joining General Sherman.

General Grant had sent General Gregg's cavalry on a reconnaissance, for the purpose of ascertaining the movements of Hood's army. Gregg's troops from his camp to Augusta. General Gregg took and destroyed Stacy's Tech station, but failed to obtain any information, and was closely followed by the enemy during his retreat to the Federal lines at camp.

The New York World says that President Lincoln's Message (delivered to Congress ere this) is conservative in character, and will join at the conciliation of all parties and classes in the North. President Lincoln, it is said, "repudiates the factions which would establish the present conflict upon a sectional basis, and takes strong national ground upon which Democrats and Conservatives of every class have no hesitation to stand and rally. He has been induced to adopt this policy by Mr. Seward, whose efforts have been in this direction ever since the Conservatives of all parties, and to form out of these elements a new party which would bring Grant and Sherman to the end of existence." The principal part of the message relates to the present condition of the finances of the country, and to the measures calculated to prevent its more growing worse.

The examination of the persons suspected of firing the hotels in New York will be begun, by a military commission, on Dec. 19.

Governor Seymour has declined to receive the British peace address, but referred Mr. Barker to Secretary Seward, who also declined it, and likewise refused him an interview with the President, unless new proposes presenting the address to Congress.

The Federals forcibly taken (from American waters) has been run into and sunk by a Federal transport-steamer off Fort Monroe. It was supposed that she would be successfully run into Norfolk, and regarded it as a strange and envious affair, and thinks it will add to existing complications. The World says the pretence of an accident is too transparent to deceive anybody. The News thinks she was sunk designedly, and adds that the sinking does not cancel the duty of indemnity. The Times says the occurrence is yet open to regard in the right or wrong of the seizure, but contends that thus far there is no ground for complaint. Admiral Buchanan and the officers of the Florida have been sent to Fort Warren.

President Lincoln has issued a proclamation announcing the ratification of the treaty with Belgium excluding the Scheldt dues.

It is reported that both the Chickamauga and Tallahassee had arrived safely in Wilmington, and that the latter was about to run the gauntlet for Bermuda with a cargo of cotton. There were twenty-one blockade-runners at Nassau on Nov. 12. The schooner Albert Edward was captured while attempting to run out of Galveston, Texas, with a cargo of 150 bales of cotton.

Gold, on 2, was quoted at 229.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA.

The Quebec Mercury states that Imperial officers, deputed to examine the frontier and to report on a system of defence, have elected a system of defence which will be approved by the military authorities at home, and is about to be carried out as far as pecuniary means are required. This scheme is told by the Mercury the theory that no campaign in Canada can be continued during the winter. It includes the construction of permanent works and field works at vital points sufficient to arrest the progress of an invader and compel him to resort to tedious siege operations by regular approaches.

We understand (says the Guardian News of the 8th inst.) that it is not the intention of the Hon. Sir Alexander Galt, the Canadian Minister to visit England at present, the Hon. George Brown having consented to take charge of the several matters which otherwise would have brought the former gentleman to this country. The Hon. George Brown returns to Canada on the 31st inst., to be in time for the anticipated session of the Canadian Legislature, which meets in January. While in England he will confer with the Imperial authorities on the subject of defences, and also on other important questions.

The Assembly of Vancouver Island has been again engaged in discussing the advisability of the union of the colonies of Vancouver Island and British Columbia.

The Sutlej, the flagship of Rear-Admiral the Hon. Joseph Denman, and the Devastation, commanded by Captain Pilkington, were expected during the first week of October in punishing the Indian tribes of the Clayquoot Sound, Vancouver Island, for the murder of the crew of a small vessel named the Kingfisher, which they had previously plundered and destroyed. As they refused to give up the murderers for justice, the marauders attacked their village, in the Barclay Sound, an inlet of Clayquot Sound; their huts were burned, their canoes taken away, and after some fighting, on the 7th and 8th of October, they were forced to comply with the demands, and promise no more to offend in like manner. We have been favoured by Lieutenant Hall, of the Sutlej, with a couple of sketches, one of which will be engraved for a future Number.

It is understood that the chief station of the British fleet in the Pacific will henceforth be Esquimalt Harbour, near the city of Victoria, Vancouver Island, instead of Valparaiso, in South America, as heretofore.

An extensive fire, said to be the work of an incendiary, took place at Yale, in British Columbia, on the 28th of October. Thirteen houses were destroyed.

CHINA AND JAPAN.

Affairs in China are becoming settled, and, though a few Taepings remain in arms, it is not considered they can give any further trouble.

The Peking papers publish news from Japan stating that the representatives of the European Powers had been received at Jeddo by the Grand Council of the Empire, who gave them complete satisfaction. The silk trade is to be freed from all restrictions, and the territory of the Prince of Nagato having been confiscated by the Tycoon, the latter will pay the indemnity demanded by the European Powers.

The extensive paper manufactory of M. Gerard, at Ghent, in Belgium, was a few days back destroyed by fire.

The Baroness of Austria has engaged a Hungarian lady, Mdlle. de Ferency, to act as companion and to converse in the language of her country.

Mr. Edward A'Beckett, a son of the former Chief Justice of the colony of Victoria, has been appointed registrar to the University of Melbourne, in the room of Mr. Pinnock.

The Queen has appointed William Henry Hemans, Esq., to be her Majesty's Consul at Buffalo, in the United States, and Mr. Walter Wyatt Abbas as consul in the Island of Barbadoes for the king of the Netherlands.

A Parliamentary paper has been issued, correcting a former one, respecting the Greek loan. The sum issued out of the Consolidated Fund on this account up to the end of March is £767,279; the balance of the Greek Government is £261,403. The last repayment, amounting to £7647, was made in 1862.

As the Alexandrea, belonging to Dundee, was steaming about in Dundee Roads, on the 24th of September, a large shoal of cod made their way observed not far distant from her. Boats were put out, and the crew succeeded in securing the animal. When the rope came to those fish they dared imbedded in its body, two or three inches beneath the skin, a piece of a tarpaulin, about 18 in. long. On one side of it were engraved the words, "Traveller, Peterhead," and on the other, "1858." The Dundee Courier states that this vessel was built about eight years ago, in Cumberland Strait, when prosecuting the whale fishery there, and the harpoon must therefore have remained in the animal for that time at least.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

The Marquis of Westminster has given £1000 to the Metropolitan Drinking and Relief Association, Falmouth.

Mr. C. Buxton, M.P., has offered to erect a fountain, value £1500, in Palace-yard, Westminster.

The main entrance to the Great Exhibition building (the only portion of the edifice which remained standing) was demolished on Monday.

A race from Putney to Mortlake, for £200, was rowed on Tuesday, between C. Messenger and O. Goodwin, won by a few seconds.

An almost perfect example of the great Auk (Alca impennis), in a summer state, has been forwarded to the British Museum by the President of the New-York Historical Society, Fulton-street.

The ninety-eighth anniversary of the foundation of the Royal Academy of Arts was celebrated on Saturday, the 10th inst., when the medals and prizes were awarded to the successful students. The travelling studentship of £160 for two years was gained by Mr. Edward Lovett.

The trustees and managers of the Christian Witness Fund presented, on Tuesday, an address, with £500, to Dr. John Campbell, who has held the editorship of that publication for the last twenty-five years. The Nonconformist says a petition he has accepted twenty-one years. Both magazines were originated by Dr. Campbell.

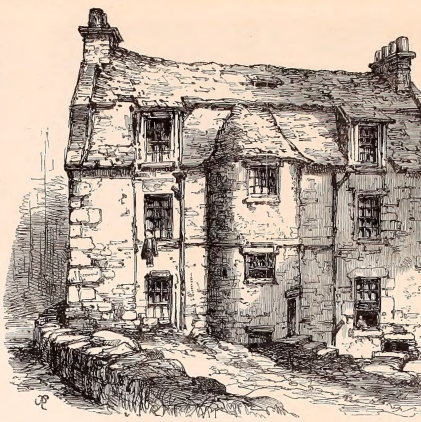
In consequence of Christmas Day falling this year on Sunday, the trustees of the British Museum have resolved that the museum shall be connected with that institution a holiday on Monday, Jan. 2, instead of Tuesday, the 3rd. The new reading-room, which has been for some time in large numbers on Boxing Day, will not be deprived of the opportunity of visiting that institution. On the last occasion of Christmas Day falling on Sunday, the visitors to the museum on the following day exceeded 20,000.

A meeting was held yesterday at the Metropolitan Orphan Asylum, to be held at Asbeton's Hotel on Wednesday for the purpose of receiving the report of the preliminary committee, electing officers, and transacting other business. The chief work to be taken by the Association will be to obtain parliamentary action in establishing the charity. Resolutions carrying out the object of the meeting will be moved by Mr. Alderman Lusk, Mr. Alderman Harrison, Mr. Harrington, rector; and Mr. Rosborne, collector.

A meeting was held at the Mansion House on Wednesday—the Lord Mayor in the chair—in support of a project for the establishment of an asylum after the model of that at Hanwell, for the insane poor of the Anglo-Saxon race. It is proposed that the asylum, when complete, shall contain 1000 inmates, and be erected somewhere in the vicinity of London. Two gentlemen are to elect the children without being subject to the assurance of a vacancy. Mr. Alderman Lusk, who presided, announced that donations and subscriptions, showing a total amount received of more than £7000.

At the annual meeting of the Society of Arts on Wednesday evening Sir Robert Kane read a paper on the recent progress and present state of industry in Ireland and the Dublin International Exhibition of 1865. The paper contained a full history of the movement which led to the formation of the exhibition. The paper was of considerable length and great interest. Sir Robert Kane stated that the number of visitors to the exhibition of 1853 (the previous one) was 1,154,000; and contended that the dispersion of late years had increased the number. The very large number of visitors was shown by the reading of the paper.

A distinguished company assembled on Wednesday at the park of the Thames Ironworks, Blackwall, to witness the launch of a remarkable vessel, the Fatah-el-Khyr, built by Messrs. Ditchburn and Mare for His Majesty the Sultan of Turkey. The principal dimensions of this splendid specimen of naval architecture are as follow:—Length between perpendiculars, 200 ft.; extra of the keel for bearings, 253 ft. 9 in.; breadth for tonnage, 36 ft. 2 in.; depth in midships from top of keel, 22 ft. 6 in.; burden in tons, 1251 8/94; with engines of 500 horse-power, nominal. The ceremony was performed by Miss Ditchburn, the youngest daughter of the builder, and she had been long observed, all Turkish etiquette notwithstanding) was performed by Miss Ditchburn, wife of the Turkish Ambassador.



Last week the births of 1961 children—1020 boys and 941 girls—were registered in London. In the corresponding week of the years 1858-62 the average number (corrected) was 1686.—The deaths in London, which had been on the rise for some weeks, in the 1200 and in the two following weeks had fallen to 1677 and 1624, further declined last week to 1521. The average number in the corresponding week of the years 1858-63, with a correction for increase of population, 1467. The deaths referred to zymotic diseases were 317, a number considerably below the average in many previous weeks. Typhus, of which 89 fatal cases were recorded, 1863, 1864, 1865, 1866, 1867, 1868, 1869, 1870, 1871, 1872, 1873, 1874, 1875, 1876, 1877, 1878, 1879, 1880, 1881, 1882, 1883, 1884, 1885, 1886, 1887, 1888, 1889, 1890, 1891, 1892, 1893, 1894, 1895, 1896, 1897, 1898, 1899, 1900, 1901, 1902,

THE BIRTHPLACE OF THE LATE DAVID ROBERTS, R.A.

We present an Engraving of the house in which the late David Roberts was born, as mentioned in the biographical notice which accompanied his Portrait in our last week's Number. The house is still in the state in which it was in 1809, when Mr. E. W. Cooke, R.A., as a token of private friendship, made the sketch he has kindly allowed us to copy. It is situated in Church-lane, Stockbridge, once a detached village, but now part of the New Town of Edinburgh. The spot is close to the brook called the Water o' Leith, and near St. Bernard's Well. Our View is of the back of the house, showing the circular staircase. The front, which looks into a narrow street, is much less picturesque, but adorned with a stone tablet, or lintel, over the doorway, bearing the legend, sculptured in relief:

I FEAR GOD ONLYE
1605. I.B.

The house itself, however, is not so ancient as the date of this inscription. Mr. Roberts told a friend that it was built in 1790, out of the materials of some old houses in Marline's Wynd, which were taken down to make room for the South Bridge. In connection with this record of the painter's birthplace, it is pleasing to mention that when, by his own genius and industry, he had raised himself in social rank, he took care to make ample provision for his father and mother, settling upon the aged couple a sufficiently yearly allowance for their support. Another eminent painter, Raeburn, was born in the same suburb of Edinburgh.

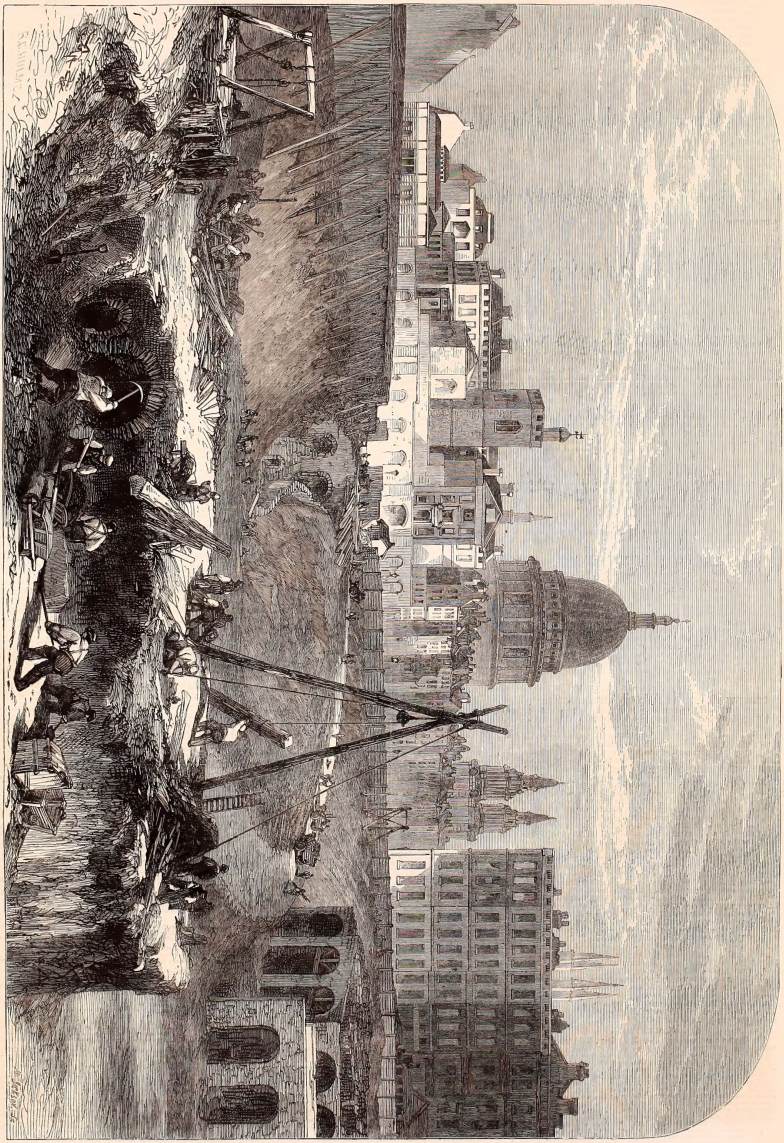
OPENING OF THE SUSPENSION-BRIDGE AT CLIFTON.



THE Suspension Bridge over the River Avon at Clifton was formally opened on Thursday week. It was a great day for Bristol and Clifton, as well as for the neighbouring parts of Gloucestershire and Somersetshire, now furnished with magnificently with a convenient passage from one shore to the other of the river by which they are divided. The history of this project is somewhat remarkable. In the year 1753 Alderman Vick, of Bristol, bequeathed to the Society of Merchant Venturers the sum of £1000, directing that such sum should be placed out at interest until it should accumulate and increase to £10,000, when it was to be applied to the building of a stone bridge across the Avon from Clifton-down, in the county of Gloucester, to Leighdown, in the county of Somerset. This was the origin of the gigantic scheme that has only just now been carried into execution, after the lapse of 111 years. It was at once perceived to be impossible to build a stone bridge across so vast a chasm. For nearly eighty years the £1000 left by Mr. Vick was allowed to accumulate; and in the year 1830, when the railway system was beginning to make itself felt, the citizens of Bristol began to think of the old legacy and the possibility of applying it to the purpose for which it was left. At that time the money had increased to £8000, and it was resolved to use the amount as the nucleus of whatever sum might be required to construct the bridge. An Act of Parliament was obtained, and plans were advertised for. The first estimate given for a stone bridge was £90,000, about half what such a building, if practicable, would cost; so stone was given up for iron, and Telford, the builder of the Menai Bridge, and the late Mr. Brunel, competed for the honour of giving a design for a suspension bridge. Mr. Brunel's design was preferred. His estimate was £57,000; but when £45,000 had been spent only the towers had been built, and the work came to a stop. His design was a chain bridge of a single span of 700 ft., two chains passing over two towers, and being anchored deep in the limestone rocks behind them. In 1846 all the money was gone, and the scheme was in abeyance for want of funds, and, though many propositions were made to the trustees under the old Act of Parliament, the bridge would very likely have been incomplete to this day had not the removal of Hungerford Bridge become necessary. Mr. Brunel, as it happened, had been the engineer of Hungerford Bridge; and when, therefore, its chains had to be pulled down and to give place to the bridge of the Charing-cross

SCENE FROM "THE WORKMEN OF PARIS."

We have already noticed the new domestic drama of Parisian life, which the management of the Adelphi has borrowed from the Porte St. Martin. "Les Drames du Cabaret"—a title which might have been translated "Tragedies of the Tap-room"—is designed, like the latest works of Mr. George Cruikshank, as a warning against the vice of drunkenness. The greatest villain, however, among the dramatis personæ is an elderly Dutch merchant, who does not get drunk, though he seduces, betrays, and murders the unwary victims of his machinations; while the honest workman Daubry, who only beats his wife and children after a glass too much, and M. Albert, the dissipated young gentleman who ruins a poor girl as it were inadvertently, when rather over-excited by wine, are represented as fit objects of our sympathy. The moral would therefore seem to be that habitual intoxication is not the worst of vices after all, but that M. Van Gratz himself, the wicked old rich man of the story, is said to have once got tipsy in his youth and killed the father of Albert in his cups. The dramatic interest of the piece, with the powerful acting of Mr. Benjamin Webster, will probably continue to draw for many nights a crowded audience who may not care to discuss its moral teaching. There are two novel and elaborate scenic effects, which greatly add to the attractions of the play. One of them represents a foundry, or engineer's factory, with all its machinery at work; the other is a view of Paris by moonlight, taking in the Pont Neuf and the Cité, with the towers of Notre Dame in the background. The reality of this picture is heightened by the introduction of lighted lamps and similar appliances, producing a spectacle which in its kind has not been surpassed. The Engraving we here present gives a fair idea of it. Mr. Gates is the painter of this scene.

THE WORKS OF THE METROPOLITAN EXTENSION RAILWAY IN SMITHFIELD.—SEE PAGE 596.

Railway, it occurred to Mr. Hawkshaw to have them applied to the completion of one of the greatest of all Mr. Brunel's bridge designs. For such a purpose the money was soon forthcoming. A new company, under a new Act and presided over by Captain Huish, was started, with a capital of £55,000. The chains of Hungerford Bridge were purchased for £9000; the stone towers, built by Mr. Brunel for the old company, for £2000. Two years ago the work of slinging these chains began, and the bridge is now finished. A few words of description will suffice. The bridge is supported by these chains on each side. These chains, or rather jointed iron bars, are held together by joining sixteen bars in a series of seven, or posts of link—ten and eleven bars, an odd and even number, alternately; composing one link; each bar of each link being 24 ft. long by 7 in. broad and 1 in. thick. The shore ends of the chains are secured by taking down the lake no less than 73 ft. deep into the bed of the limestone rocks and there laying them on a bed with solid masonry. The towers over which these chains pass are built after the massive and ponderous style of Egyptian architecture. There are arched towers 48 ft. wide by 30 ft. thick and 80 ft. high. On the Bristol side they only go down some 10 ft. or 12 ft. to meet the rock, but on the opposite shore the shifting conformation of the strata requires a pile of masonry 100 ft. high to meet the roadway above it. The bridge, which hangs from the chains over these towers, is made by tie-rods, 2 in. in diameter and 8 ft. apart—three rods in number on each side of the structure. Each pair of tie-rods have suspended to them the cross girders which carry the floor of the roadway. These girders are 18 in. deep and 33 ft. long, and, like all the rest of the work, are of wrought iron. The roadway is 20 ft. wide, and the footways 5½ ft. wide each. A division 2 ft. high is formed between the roadway and the footways by two long wrought-iron girders, 8 ft. deep by 8 in. wide, which, like two backbones, stiffen the bridge from end to end, and check the vibration caused by the passage of the cars, or, in the case of the bridge being 2½ ft. at the centre. The saddles or rollers which let the chains move over the towers meet the contraction and expansion caused by changes of heat and cold in the atmosphere. The total span of the bridge is 702 ft. 3 in., and its height above the water is 260 ft. It is thus the longest and highest suspension-bridge in the world. All the iron work, wrought or cast, has been supplied by the Messrs. Cochrane.

The ceremony of opening the new bridge was attended with much festivity and pomp. There was a procession through the city of Bristol, composed of all the trades and societies, including the bankers and models illustrative of various callings. This procession, which came early, was immense in numbers, and took nearly three hours to walk through. Beside it, on the left, was the railway viewer, whence they wound down by the "zigzag" to the banks of the Avon. There was another and more dignified procession, however, to pass precisely at twelve o'clock to perform the actual ceremony. It comprised the Lord Lieutenant of Gloucestershire, Earl Ducie, the Lord Lieutenant of Somersetshire, the Earl of Cork, the High Sheriff of Bristol, the mayors, the Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol, the Mayor and Corporation of Bristol, the members and city members of Parliament, the chairman and directors of the bridge company, with its officers; the engineers, Mr. Hawkshaw and Mr. W. Barlow; the contractors, Messrs. Cochrane and Grove; the superintendent of the works, Mr. Wright, and the workmen; the Master and Wardens of the Society of Merchant Venturers; the foreign Consuls; the Freemasons, Foresters, and other Friendly Societies, escorted by the Yeomanry Cavalry, the Volunteer Artillery, and the Royal Engineers. This procession did not arrive upon the ground till all the spectators and performers were assembled—that is to say, till the approaches to the bridge were filled, till the Suspension Bridge Committee could, at the sight of steep grey cliffs lined with dense masses of people. The opening ceremony was performed by the representative of the bridge from the Clifton to the Leigh Wood side, amidst a grand salute from the Volunteer Artillery. From the Somerset side the return was made in the same order to the Clifton approaches, where end, when a hall was called in front of the grand strand erected for visitors; and Captain Huish, the chairman of the company, read a brief address, setting forth the history of the undertaking, which was loudly cheered. The Bishop of Gloucester offered up a prayer; after which, in a few brief words, the Earl of Ducie, for the county of Gloucester and city and county of Bristol, and the Earl of Cork for the county of Somerset, each formally declared the bridge opened to the public for traffic, amidst renewed cheers, which were repeated again and again. The Engraving on our front page gives a view of this animated scene.

In the course of the afternoon a late dejeuner, or early dinner, was given at the Victoria Rooms, to which all the distinguished and the leading gentry of Bristol and its neighbourhood were invited. During the night the bridge was illuminated with the strings of lamps and with Bengal fires. We have preferred, however, to give for our second Illustration a view of this majestic structure, as seen by daylight, with the romantic scenery around it.

THE WORKS OF THE METROPOLITAN RAILWAY

EXTENSION TO SMITHFIELD.

The Tunbury Extension of the Metropolitan Railway, a line of three quarters of a mile, from the present terminus near the head of Farringdon-street to the property of City station at Smithfield-pavement, is making rapid progress with its excavations and brickwork, under the direction of Mr. Armstrong, whom the contractors, Messrs. Jay and Co., have placed in charge of these operations. There is a prospect of the line being finished in the course of next year. The greater part of its length is open cutting; but some portions are to be carried under ground, as the houses taken down may be rebuilt in their former sites, especially in those places where the railway interests any of the valuable property that stretches between Aldersgate and Finsbury. The line traverses Smithfield from west to east, the railway passes along the south of Charterhouse-square parallel with Barbican, and reaches the proposed Aldersgate-street station at the corner of Long-lane; from which point it goes straight to Finsbury-pavement, crossing Goswell-road by a skew-bridge on its way. The Metropolitan Extension of the London, Chatham, and Dover Railway, starting from that line at the junction of Farringdon-street, before it reaches the intended approach to the Farringdon-street station, runs past no Snow-hill, beneath King-street and Westcheap-street, to join the Finsbury Extension of the Metropolitan, properly so called, at the spot represented in our Engraving which is made from a sketch taken a fortnight or thereabouts ago. The brickwork shown in our Illustration, and now greatly advanced, is to form a basement for the general goods market, which will be situated directly over the railway in the western part of Smithfield. The spectator of our present artist took his sketch is near the bottom of Cow-cross and St. Johnstreet, looking towards the south-west. St. Bartholomew's Hospital, with St. Paul's Cathedral behind, and the pinnacles of St. Sepulchre's and the Law Courts rising from the intervening mass of houses. The line is to be used by the London, Chatham, and Dover Company, will be still more used by the arrangement just concluded, which enables the London and South-Western Company to run their trains from Clapham Junction, or rather from Battersea, upon the London, Chatham, and Dover Company's line, running for Balham and Ludgate-hill, thence, as here described, to Farringdon-street, Aldersgate-street, and Finsbury-pavement. It appears, moreover, that the Metropolitan Extension will not stop at Finsbury, but be continued to Liverpool-street, in the very heart of the City.

The Government emigrant-ship Himalaya, 1050 tons, belonging to Messrs. John Lidgett and Sons, London, sailed from Plymouth on the 6th inst. for Melbourne, New South Wales, with 600 emigrants, consisting of 231 married people, 182 single men, 112 single women, 36 boys and 42 girls between the ages of one year and 14, and 7 infants—in all upwards of 1000 souls. THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.
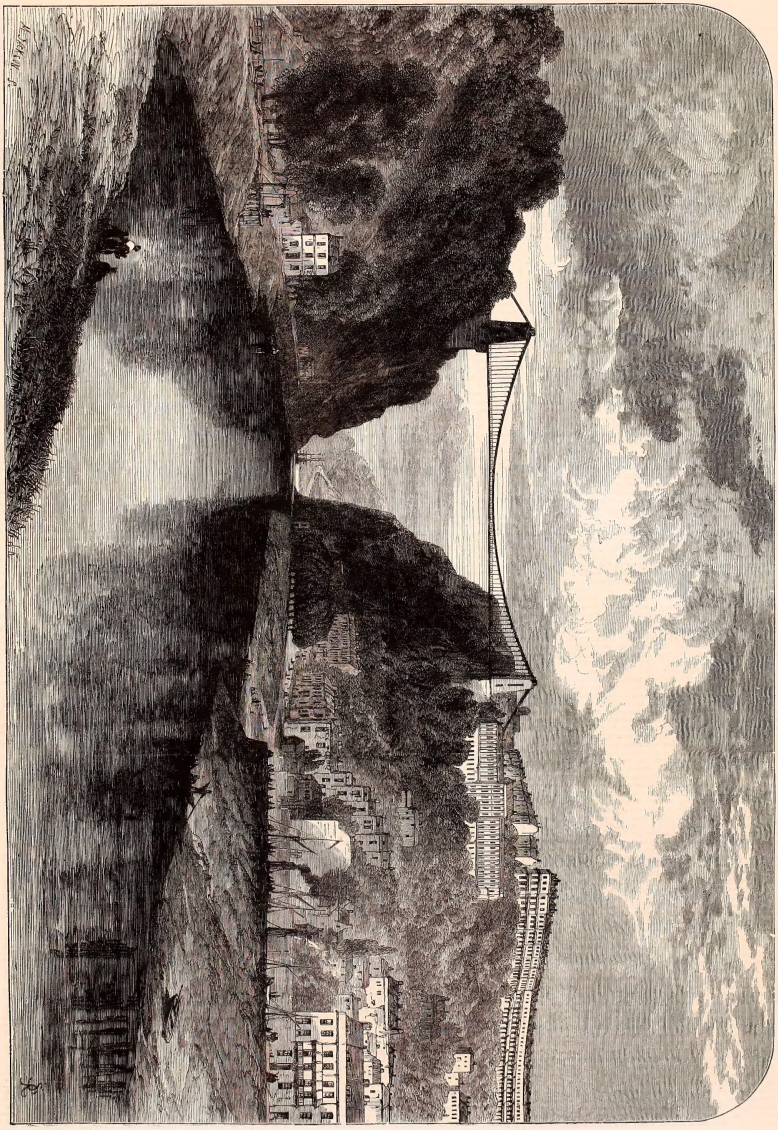
LONDON: SATURDAY, DECEMBER 17, 1864.

THE well-known inscription which invites visitors to French houses to "Speak to the porter" has occasioned many an irascible doorkeeper to splutter with rage at the jokes of irreverent young fellows who have pretended to understand the invitation as a request to all persons to come and converse with him. George Colman used the same idea in one of his poems, in which a gentleman explains why he has sounded such an awful peal at the doctor's door:—



'Tis time for bed, and I was hast'ning to it;
But when you write up "Please to ring the bell,"
Common politeness makes me stop and do it.

We should like to know whether, if "Speak to the magistrate" were written up at the police courts, that official would be exposed to many more impertinences than now. The ridiculous interviews (not a quarter of them are reported) to which our police magistrates are subjected, and the hindrance of public business, are becoming a nuisance, which is serious in itself though ludicrous in its conditions.

Perhaps as odd an application as has ever been made to a sitting magistrate was preferred on Wednesday last to Mr. Tyrwhitt, and we could almost fancy that the perpetrator intended benevolently to favour us with a topic to help out the dull talk which is about to set in with severity at this festive season. A tall and gentlemanly man goes before the magistrate, and tells a long story, which need not be taken into account, the point being that he and a lady to whom he was attached had received, if they could not rise to a higher position in the world, to commit suicide by poison. They made the vow, bought the poison, and could not rise in the world. But, instead of performing their rash undertaking, they, much more wisely, agreed to separate and oblige the world by continuing to live. Having arrived at this wise and determined not to die, the applicant handed to the magistrate a small bottle, which was stated to contain poison, and which the repentant Werther seems to have wished to be deposited in the archives of the court. Whether Mr. Tyrwhitt thought that he was not called upon by his magisterial duties to keep a registeroffice for non-suicides, or whether he believed that the applicant was not exactly in the state of mind which is necessary to the validity of an obligation, the excellent magistrate suggested that the police were the proper depositories for the specific article which was offered to the care of the court. He

ECHOES OF THE WEEK.

To one who has been absent from the Great City and from England for a whole year, London seems strangely altered. The present year has not recently returned from a long journey—a journey which began in the year 1863—and, during the last ten days, he has been diligently taking stock of the changes in the aspect of the busy hive of humanity beyond all cities in the world best beloved by him. Nothing need be said of the dear friends whom he left late and found many not always boasting that chaussée to the grave. Nor need he allude, in detail, to a subject so delicate as the fact of so many of his friends having grown grey and fat. Has he, forsooth, found a Fontaine de Jouvence and grown younger beyond sea? He is delighted, however, to see that many respected acquaintances who, when he left England, were content to patronise omnibuses and cabs, now ride in broughams; and that some have migrated from Bloomsbury to Belgravia, and are attended by domestics in plush. Some have gotten into Parliament, and others have fallen in love, and a few are married, and one or two are gone into the Gazette. Which is the way of the world, generally.

But the changes. They seem to us multifarious. Scores of new hotels, more or less palatial, handsome or the reverse; an inundation of cartes de visite in the shop windows, a magnificent railway terminus at Charing-cross, about belonging to one company or another, almost every street corner, the view of St. Paul's from Ludgate-hill entirely spoilt by a hideous iron bridge, the view of Northumberland House from Cockspur-street seriously vitiated by the Grand Hotel, terminus aforesaid, almost everything commercial converted into a fonticstock Company (limited), and the Strand, Charing-cross, and Dover Railway everywhere. These and the Thames embankment, and a few omnibuses of novel construction and greater block—a few of thoroughfares thus even, and the Banting system, and the total absence of original pieces from the theatres, are a few of the changes we have jotted down since our return to Babylon.

The lovers of "lengthened sweetness long drawn out" will be delighted to learn that her Majesty the Queen has graciously consented to nominate and appoint his Highness Prince Edward Bracklesi Faud Ismail-Zogloul-Pacha Rajagee, Baron Randeer Sing Baladoor of Kuppoorthalla, to be a Knight of the most exalted order of the Star of India. Thank you. Any more? We have not the honour to know his Highness, but the intimate knowledge of nomenclature we thank him for his tremendous appellation. Poor Thomas Williams Henry Fortescue, commonly called Tom Fortescue, Harrison is, we fear, deceased; so now, H. H. F. D. R. D.-ii. R. R. Baron Baladoor of Kuppoorthalla, is probably without a rival in length of cognomen. As Poor Fortescue used to say, "People will innkeeper and the benighted traveller? Who is it to—asked mice lost from his wayfaring, as he hunted a thunderclap at the door. "Who is it?" a voice replied, "Don Jose Maria Pepe Ramon Antonio Carlos Miguel Saavedra de Aguilera y Lemus y Garipzo y Silva y Torres y Sanetic y Gonzales y Barandiaran y——" Stop, stop! Your Highnesses, you must go somewhere else. I haven't room for half of you.

Those who recognise when an opportunity occurs before the public that the author himself is idle or invalided have, perhaps, wondered when Mr. Russell Sullivan became one, or Mr. William Howard Russell, of Crimean, Indian, and American fame. People not versed in the secrets of the prison-house, or initiated to the mysteries of the penitentiary, cannot, however, be expected to know that, when a favourite writer is, seemingly, lying fallow, he is probably fagging away against a day to accommodate the public curiosity. We have in any case a proof, this week, that Mr. Russell has not been resting long on his oars; for Messrs. Tinsley Brothers have just republished, in an extended form, the letters to the editor of General Tolleben's defence of Sebastopol, a portion of which appeared recently in the Times, and was considerable evidence of the precisest and appreciative pen of the famous "Special."

Of minor books there is, we regret to say, a good deal; and very vile and stupid samples of bookmaking some of them are; but we may congratulate the public on a very great improvement which, to our thinking, has taken place within the twelve months in the style of the popular departments of literature. Lord Sidney Godolphin Osborne has, it is said, been lately and lengthily in Paris, endeavouring in the strongest language the current run of books for children. According to his lordship, our little masters and misses are frightened out of their wits by tales of ogres and goblins and fairies, literature in the most appalling manner, and relating the frightful tribulations undergone by Master Tommy because he would not eat his bread and butter, she told fibs. There has been, perhaps, too much of this kind of thing lately, mainly based on the German model. The Germans are very much addicted to mingling the ghastly with the grotesque, and excel in delineating what may be called the "quaintly cruel." But, if our remembrance serves us, our own countrywoman was not afraid of terror-inspiring apologues. We were continually alarmed with stories of haughty little boys who were eaten up by bears, and of naughty women, in particular, a dreadful legend of a poor little fellow who was borne in a basket, and who in his dying breath confessed that he had "played last night with Tommy, lighting candles." Sometimes children should not bring on paralysis or brain disease. The modern children's books are, in our judgment, written in a far healthier and better spirit than we fear that the kindly S. G. O., carried away by indignation against such stories as "The Three Little Kittens who lost their Mittens," has overlooked the many cheery and charming books which now decorate the nursery library. Is "Precocious Piggy," sad as is the extraordinary tale, worse than "Jack the Giant-killer" or "Little Red Brechen Told" deleterious to the juvenile mind? Of course, like those virtuous persons who declare that we have had no good actors since the days of Bannister and Munden, we hold that the best stories for children were written were those of our own nonage: "The Butterfly's Ball" and "Mr. Pringle and Mr. Pringle" are in point instance; but it would be in the highest degree unjust to deny the tasty, and witty, and, both of invention and execution, with which the majority of children's books are now produced.

While we are on the subject of the little folk, we have a word to say which takes us very far away from literature. Some months ago, a wholly gramme to our topic, however, for S. G. O. has elaborately reopened the question of nursery education and punishment. Philip the legal gentleman had not a very definite notion of what he was talking about. A nursery family can be managed without any punishment, graver than a reprimand; but the discipline of a public school must be preserved somehow, and in every school there is a certain proportion of insolence and refractory children. The feeling of the boy is not with corporal punishment. The rod and the cane have been taken away from the question of boys. The general opinion now is how is she to dispense with punishment; or, in extreme cases, how is she to inflict it? You can't put a little girl in the corner, as Mr. Punch's friend of Genesis; you can't report her to the committee, or to the headmaster, or fine her £5; and the legal gentleman tells us that to shut her up in a cupboard is "monstrous." The advisers of Silas Marner never, our readers will remember, of a different opinion when the question between shutting up Effie in the coal-hole and plugging her in soft and safe places was mooted. We venture to say that the children of Mr. Punch's friend will grow up of an act of downright mutiny, would, in nine cases out of ten, proceed to administer a sound "spanking." But "spanking" is banished from schools; and we see this unlucky, blundering, perfectly well-meaning governess drifting from corner to corner, and at last losing her temper, and, in the heat of passion, thrashing the child with a stick which might have most seriously injured her.

MEMBERS OUT OF PARLIAMENT.

WHEN the Prime Minister was known to be about to visit Bradford, a short while ago, it was understood that a moral demonstration of a very significant kind in favour of Parliamentary reform was to be made by the working classes of that borough. The affair did not go off exactly as was expected, but enough remained, but the fact of such a proceeding having been conceived and, to a considerable extent, carried out the question of the suffrage was under serious discussion in Bradford. It was, therefore, perfectly natural and appropriate that who, it seems, are desirous of taking the lead in a movement for the purpose of giving effect to the views of the working men, should come to their town. Nothing could have been more fitting, under the circumstances, than that Mr. W. E. Forster, a member for the borough, should preside at the meeting, and, perhaps, that Mr. Bright should have been more likely to acquit himself well in the function which he assumed. The Right Honourable which Mr. Bright in the House is distinguished one, and he always gives an idea of aptitude for admiration. The designation of "Right Honourable" is always floating like a halo round his head; and an effort of imagination might picture him—morally, of course—in the attitude of Glory when she was putting up the proffered crown. It needs but a little more precision in policy in any liberal Government to make any one of many statesmen of which now exists to limit Mr. Forster in that office on the verge of which he seems always to stand. It is surely that a member succeeds so well as he does in standing fast by the time-honoured principles of reform and yet delivers himself orally with so much tact and self-possession as to have himself considered by Government and parties as a statesman. There is no doubt whatever of his principles, but he does not commit himself to any special scheme of reform. Even in his speech at the Bradford meeting, although the position he occupied was that of a leader, he only touched the active carrying out of a political object, some of that quality of timidity and dilatoriness which, combined with energy which has been allotted to it to be traced; and assuredly if the object which he was aiming at was to be attained by agency and instrumentality as he would advise and adopt, a reform bill could scarcely have been achieved. In this Yorkshire political congress the West Riding attracted by much the largest. It may be asserted that the flower of its Liberal members were there. Two which are nevertheless full of sense, and which are not to be trifled with the inspiration of a mist bent on achieving the good and the advancement of the human family. Speeches were made, and the supposed of their natural and their civic rights. In the centre of the platform was Mr. Baines, and near Sir John Ramsden—was not. In truth, it seems to have been discovered in Yorkshire that the West Riding, with the earlier part of his Parliamentary career banned out in all the factious opposition to Sir Robert Peel, had adopted principles that Whiggery which is hesitancy in him; and, as he is still young in years, if he continues to be attached to it, he may be useful in keeping alive for a term longer than would otherwise be the case a breed of politicians which is settling down to extinction. The leaders of the reform movement in the West Riding proceeded to offer congratulate themselves on having well used the opportunity afforded them for discussing the principles of reform, and congratulated the part of the movement which they inaugurated should spread, and in 1866 or so from the extension of the suffrage, they will, in the flowing cups of those who contributed to the glorious result, deserve be freshly remembered as the bold pioneers of the achievement.

Mr. Lowe has been elected by the people of Kent to the Legislature. let him become a member for Horsham. If Mr. Seymour Fitzgerald should secede from the city, here is the very paragon of disinterested constituencies. But one man there is who will not be found. He is not to be condescend to ask his member, whether in or out of office, for any favour. Horsham is done if the public experts. The member for Horsham is the one member for whom the arrival of the postman knocks in vain. Mr. Lowe, it is true, has been in office, and Mr. Lowe has been reserved the privilege of having had but one answer to official communication. The peculiar style which is to imply rather than to pronounce refusal; a peculiar circumstance of which is the absence of epistolary literature, from the enforced study of which probably no man has had more practice than Mr. Lowe. Nevertheless, Mr. Lowe is not of the 599 electors out of this utopian borough who should be clad in any such garb as that of the procession round New Palmyra and once a year, amidst the enthusiastic plaudits of the 600 electors of Brunonia assembled to do them honour and reverence. According to Mr. Lowe's theory, the duty of a member is to represent a town. It is not only do they not ask him for anything, but they suffer him to do what he pleases, and to spend a second vote without the slightest interest in their midst to any extent of time. They believe in him, and he believes them. Seven boroughs can boast a member who so assiduously and quietly represents his constituency as the present membership until he felt ripe chance and chosen for a Cabinet office; and the selection of Mr. Lowe as the member who should be called second to that of Mr. Disraeli; and this we venture to say without fear of the Right Honourable the Secretary of Lord Stanley; for Mr. Fitzgerald's party zeal is pure and simple, and by no means exclusive, that leaven of unconscious Liberalism which constitutes Lord Stanley's party zeal. Mr. Lowe's Conservatism is of a more confirmed freshness if the Horshamites do not see much of their member, they hear of him at times and in such a way as to catch their ear and to fix their reflected radiance; and they are more than content. Now, let it not be attributed to us as blame if we give way to a suspicion that perhaps, after all, the merit of Mr. Lowe's position is not entirely with his constituents, or the speaking of this place, only tell us that it is remarkable that its free electors, who have so many of the most remarkable characters of the inhabitants; and it is just possible that they do not stir up their faculties for the discovery of men and things to any great extent, and belong to that artless class of beings who are content to be as always to be prone to accept the unknown for the wonderful. To such a point of view as this, the members of the borough may find themselves vexatiously famous, in the circumstance of a very ring—indeed, famous—circumstance, which may be said to belong to the whole world through them in a large and elaborate disquisition on foreign policy. Any way, it is subject of considerable interest that Horsham should be left to Mr. Lowe, who has earned a long period of relaxation from the petty cares of members, and who will be able to devote his entire attention to politics. He has him unassisted to the studies cognate to his official proclivities, and notable him, he has been returned for Kidderminster, and has become a ex-Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs, and ex-Under Secretary of that department.

Speaking, however, of the subject of one member for Southwark, naturally reminds one of the other, and bids us remember that Mr. Locke has been returned for that borough. Mr. Layard has precedents and probably in fact and practice, Mr. Locke is a more fitting representative for Southwark than Mr. Layard. The latter has, by force of circumstances, been compelled to give up to ministerial life interested in diplomacy, all the energies which were meant for Southwark; whereas Mr. Locke, who is not, we believe, in office, has only to wake of the Government, pecking up a crumb or two of patronage, which nobody wants, in the shape of a Lord of the Bed, and really can except as an indication of respect for his statesman-like qualities, which, it is implied, might be brought into play if required, goes to for local work. Thus, as it happened that Mr. Layard had precedents of him in their annual addresses and talked to Europe rather than to Southwark, Mr. Locke wisely confined himself to the interests of the borough and localised his ambition, making a great card of St. Thomas's Hospital, which, on his own showing, he has saved from going far into the country and has secured to Southwark by having had it placed in Lambeth. However difficult it is to see the exact sequence of this association, there are many things in politics which is peculiar to those metropolitan members who are metropolitan members and nothing else.

CHURCH AND UNIVERSITIES.

The Judicial Committee of Privy Council has under consideration the appeal of the Bishop of Natal against his deposition by the Bishop of Cape Town.

The Bishop of London's usual Tuesday levée at London House, Dorset-square, will be discontinued until after the Christmas recess in consequence of the ordination examinations.

December Church, in the parish of Frome-Vauchurch, Dorsetshire, was reopened on Wednesday, after restoration. The ancient edifice underwent the celebration of the consecration of the Bishop of Oxford, who presided at the morning meeting, gave the concluding address.

The Bishop of Oxford last Saturday consecrated a new church at Sandhurst, Berkshire, built by Miss Ellis Rule, mainly from Avon to Fleshmongers, and traversing the heaths and plantations from Avon Lodge, Sandhurst, to Sandhurst College, chiefly within the precincts of Sherem-dashers." Captain and Mrs. Sawyer and Mr. Walter, M.P., have taken the lead in this good work, and handed in subscriptions with large sums.

Silkcroft Church, Northamptonshire, was reopened on the 2nd inst. The restoration and enlargement of the church were presided for by the late Vicar, the Rev. Joseph Jones; and the last business in which he was engaged was the signing of the contract for its completion, according to the plans which he had prepared. The new nave includes a gallery for the south side. We subjoin the following special contributions:—A cost to the Incumbent, the Rev. W. Villiers and Lady Elizabeth Villiers, the Rev. Thos. James; the font by the Hon. Mrs. Watson; the altar-cloth and lungitudes, the Rev. Sir Stephen and Lady Glynne, Lenox. The tiles for the chancel and nave were laid after a design by the Rev. Lord Alwyne Compton.

PREFERMENTS AND APPOINTMENTS.—The Rev. M. F. F. Cohen, Rector of Ilmington, Warwickshire, to be Rural Dean of Fosse. Rochester: Rev. J. Clifford, Incumbent of Chipping Sodbury, to Alverstoke, Hampshire. Rev. J. Cooke, to Lee. Rev. C. Denham, Sudbury, to Rural Dean. Rev. Hensel to East Stoke, Dorset; Rev. W. Jeynes to Merston, Kent; Rev. W. H. West to Chatham Dockyard. Rev. A. Kaye, Archdeacon of Lincoln Cathedral, to Canon. Rev. D. G. Compton to Wroxton with Balscote, Banbury. Rev. Thos. Lewis, to Lavington, Sussex. Rev. Alexander Mitchell, Rev. E. Greenlaw to Norton Pogwdon, Yorkshire; Rev. C. Haggard to Ingleby Greenhow, North Yorks; Rev. Thos. Hall to Ellerton, Yorks. Rev. Hall to the new district of Ricards, Staffordshire; Rev. E. W. Chorley to St. Luke's, Chorley. Rev. Thos. Lewis, to Lavington, Sussex. Rev. Preston; Rev. Thos. Hall to Hulsted, Dorset; Rev. R. O. Francis to Holy Trinity, Weymouth; Rev. E. Preston to Sutton, Surrey; Rev. Thos. Hall to Holy Trinity, Weymouth; Rev. W. H. Jenden to Barton-le-street, Yorkshire; Rev. E. E. Habish to North Grimston, Yorkshire; Rev. Thos. Hall to Holy Trinity, Weymouth; Rev. W. Kenne to Danbury, Essex; Rev. W. H. Hemphrey to North Kelsey, Lincolnshire; Rev. Thos. Hall to Bat Arthur, Yorkshire; Rev. J. S. Thistleton to Tilongsby, Yorkshire; Rev. D. Turpin to Chesthunt, Herts; Rev. J. Wilson to Lavington, Sussex. Rev. St. Helens, Lincolnshire; Rev. P. Willy, to Sedgebrowe, Worcestershire. Rev. G. Bennett to be Warden of St. Thomas's College and Rector of Lydd, Kent. Rev. Thos. Hall, Holy Trinity, to be Precentor of Clog-ne Cathedral, and to the Union of Llegwell, Rev. G. P. Bulteel to be Rural Dean of Ottery St. Mary. Lady Rev. F. W. Trevelett to be Domestic Chaplain to Lord Watchpark.—Guardian.

THE UNIVERSITIES AND PUBLIC SCHOOLS.—St. John's College, Cambridge, has just received a noble benefaction—the bequest of about £100,000—from the late James Mozley, of the Inner Temple, bequeathed the whole of his estate, after the payment of legacies and annuities, for the endowment of two new professorships in such manner and form as Mr. Mozley's executors should most advantageously direct. The sole restriction as to the discretion reposed in him, has settled the Lord Chancellor, who, in the exercise in his own college, has appointed two professors, personally known to the munificent benefactor, and formally framed, with a view to the encouragement of the most meritorious graduates of the college who may be destined for the Bar, and to the study of that branch of the profession. The value of each studentship is £100 a year, and each is tenable for three years, or until election to a fellowship. The professorships are already established, to one of which an election will take place in Michaelmas Term, 1865, and to the second in the Michaelmas Term of the following year. Other studentships will be established on the falling in of existing fellowships, to the extent that eventually there will be twenty studentships, of the annual value of £100 each. The bequest, we learn, has gained the Hulsean Prize. The Rev. Charles Taylor, B.D., Christ's College, Cambridge, has been appointed Lady Rev. F. W. Trevelett to be Domestic Chaplain to Lord Watchpark.—Guardian.

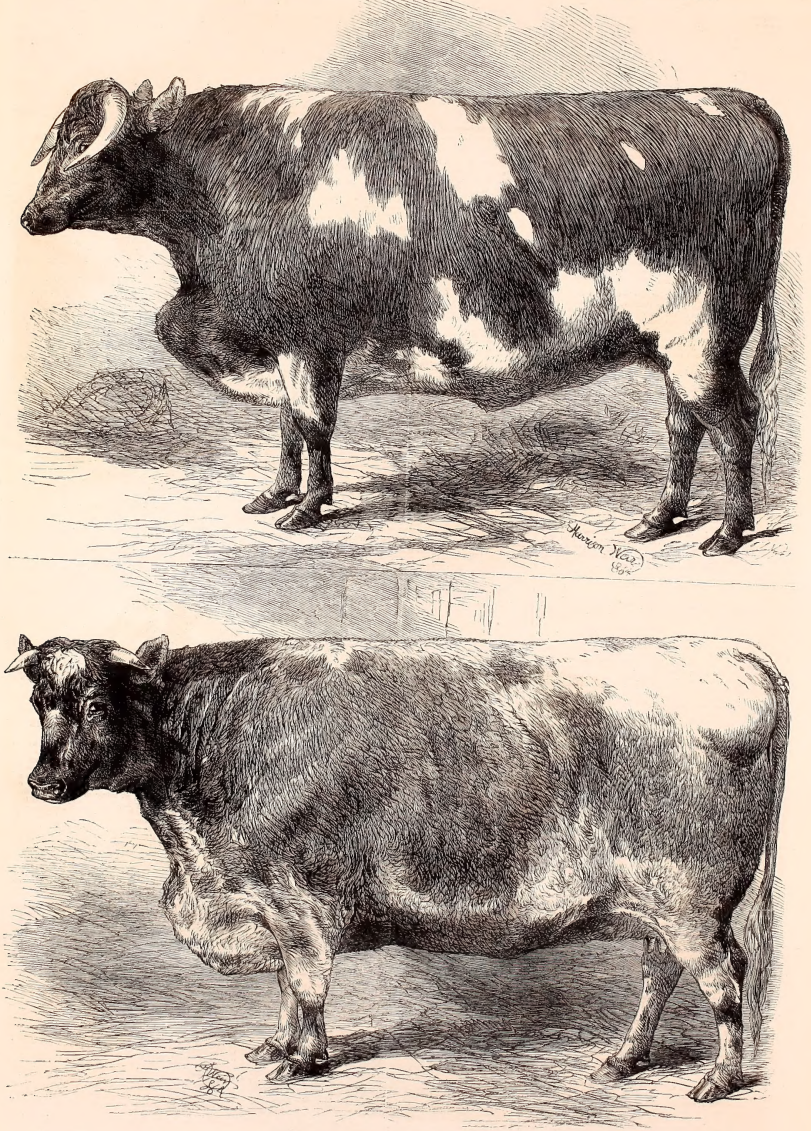
The subjects of the New Testament and the immediately preceding Jewish and the immediately succeeding Christian Literature, enunciated in the Statutes of the Founder.

The annual distribution of prizes to the students of St. Mark's College, Chelsea, took place on Saturday week under circumstances of unusual interest. The Rev. Derwent Coleridge, who is resigning his principalship of the college, took occasion to bid farewell to the assembled students. After delivering the address of the chapel, a great number of the latter being assembled in the college hall, Mr. Coleridge, the Rev. Sir Stephen R. Glynne, Bart., who presided the prizes to the successful students, saying some kind words to each. The Bishop of Oxford, who was present, congratulated the students on the interest the event must have which the college was sustaining in Mr. Coleridge, who had been for him the first principal of every old college. He (the Bishop) remember that they would bring a comfort and joy to Mr. Coleridge in his retirement to know that they were aware of the kindness he had taught them. The Rev. Derwent Coleridge then made an important announcement.

To the 30th of November, 20,817 applications had been received, and 15,000 certificates issued, in the Royal Naval Medical Service.

The Ottoman Government has accepted the proposition, previously referred to, for the appointment of a commission by the great Powers, to place the police of the Lebanon on a permanent footing.

There is reason to fear the loss, in St. George's Channel, of the Floating Light, Pembroke, prepared. A vessel of about 200 tons, a portion of several wood bearing her name has been picked up, so that the worst is feared for the crew.



A portrait-group of their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales and Prince Albert Victor on his mother's knee, in course of publication by Mr. Mayall, of Regent-street, has received the commendation of Her Majesty, of the portraiture and the delicate finish of the engraving. Another print, of the Princess of Wales with the infant Prince Albert Victor, and of Wales with the infant Prince in his cradle. Both engravings were executed by Mr. William Holl, from photographs taken by command of Her Majesty.

On the night of the 17th inst. signals of distress were heard from the St. Nicholas lightship, the wind blowing fresh from the south at the time. The gunboat Lifeboat, one of the fleet belonging to the National Lifeboat Institution, was manned by boatmen belonging to all the companies, and immediately put off to the rescue. The vessel was also succeeded in getting her off; but, owing to the loss of her rudder, she again drifted on the Goodwin Sands, and remained there some hours. At last, however, the lifeboat men succeeded in getting her off, and brought safely ashore, the vessel proved to be the Danish brig Ida, of Copenhagen, bound from London to Sunderland in ballast. She afterwards sunk. The sea was terrible, and one of the boatmen's yawls was damaged to such an extent that the men all left her and got into the lifeboat. On this occasion, when an enormous sea had previously been encountered at the wreck, there was no haughage lock on the part of the boatmen, but a noble ambition was shown by the men not to be the second for first in the lifeboat.—The Deptford (Kingsdown) lifeboat also went off on Sunday last and brought on shore the crew of a schooner which had been completely dismasted off Reculver. Gowman, which were observed with signals of distress flying near the Sunk sequence of this association, there are many things in politics which is peculiar to those metropolitan members who are metropolitan members and nothing else.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

ANOTHER arguments as to the Derby future, and statistics of the racing season, are now about the only staple of turf writers. The former are chiefly directed to the analysis of the Chesterfield and July finishes, and deductions therefrom in favour of the Duke and the latter are based almost entirely on "Weatherby's Book Calendar" which furnishes much light reading for the ring during the winter evenings. We find in its pages that 1788 races were run this year, as against 1668 last; that the number of horses engaged was 720; as for flat races in the United Kingdom now, between the years 1849 and 1860, from 1311 to 1717; and that the number has gradually crept up since then to 1948. Of these, 664 were two-year-olds. The colts and fillies register still progress steadily, and out of the 1659 this year 101 are already dead, which is about the usual proportion. The barren mares show number 522. Leamington (26), Newminster (36), Rataplan (20), St. Albans (30), Stockwell (22), Thormanby (30), Trumpeter (23), Weatherbit (29), Wild Dayrell (29), and Young Melbourne (28) have a fair stock of foals to their credit; and Mr. Simpson has no less than 61 by Velocete and Liverpool. The first lot of Scottish Queen's number eight, all of them the property of Colonel Townsley or Mr. Eastwood. There are some very good names on the foal list; but "The Stripling Screamer," "The Rotherfield Dandy," "Plausible Ginger," "The Jenny Ass," "Bread and Butter," and "The Hearse" are peculiar. The winnings of Blair Athol, pins his selling prices, are checked at £21,183; and such is now the prestige of the Spring Cottage stable that bidders are to be found for Breadalbane at 11 to 1, and for his equally dark kinsman, Broomlelaw, at 33 to 1. Mr. Dawson has yet to accomplish the Halvergate feat of winning the Two Thousand and the Doncaster Cup in a year,

CHAPPELL'S NEW SYSTEM of PIANING OF CHEAP PIANOS to which the Prize Medal was awarded—at very much below half-price. The system of Pianing is a check action, and most perfect touch, admirably adapted to small Rooms, Cottages, and Schools, and is applicable to any Piano. It is the best and cheapest Pianoforte, with check action and all the latest improvements.
Price, in handsome case, 6 octaves, 16 guineas. A great variety may be seen at CHAPPELL and Co.'s, 50, New Bond-street.

CHAPPELL and CO.'S ENGLISH MODEL COTTAGE PIANOFORTES.—To musicians preferring the light touch and the pure quality of tone of the Viennese Pianos, and to those who require a Pianoforte to stand well in tune, CHAPPELL and Co. recommend their COTTAGE PIANOFORTE, with check action, at a moderate price. The action is of the same simple description as that in above mentioned Viennese Pianos, and is the invention of the makers, by whom the many complicated actions are objectionable to many of the best musicians, as getting out of order. The tone of these Pianos is very superior to other instruments at 30 guineas, price 35 guineas; in walnut, 40 guineas.
CHAPPELL and Co., 50, New Bond-street.

BROADWOOD, COLLARD, and ERARD. The best Pianofortes of every description, including all the newest kinds of Cottages, may be obtained only of the makers or of their Sole Agent, CHAPPELL and Co., 50, New Bond-street.

CHAPPELL'S TWENTY-GUINEA PIANOFORTE, in handsome Rosewood Case, with the best English manufacture, with perfect check action, the full compass, seven octaves, and all the improvements. The Proprietors have recommended this Instrument as superior to any other pianoforte at or about the same price, manufactured in London.
CHAPPELL and Co., 50, New Bond-street.

ALEXANDRE'S NEW DRAWING-ROOM MODEL HARMONIUM, the best that can be made, price 60 guineas. Illustrated Lists of Alexandre's Harmoniums, Illustrated Catalogue and Harmonium Journal upon application to

THE RAJAH OF KAPOORTHALLA, KNIGHT OF THE STAR OF INDIA.

THE Rajah Randhir Singh, of Kapoorthalla, is one of the Princes of the Punjaub whom Sir John Lawrence, Governor-General of India, has rewarded above all his peers and fellow-countrymen for his loyal services to Queen Victoria in lending aid to suppress the mutiny and rebellion of 1857. At the grand durbar, or assembly, which took place at Lahore on the 17th of October (and of which we intend to give some further Illustrations), the Rajah was solemnly invested by Sir John Lawrence with the order of the Star of India, having already received from the Government of Lord Canning, we believe, some more substantial tokens of approval, including the grant of an estate valued at £40,000 a year. It is agreed, however, that no native in India has better deserved these favours at the hands of the English rulers of that vast empire; for it was he who, in the darkest days of its late trouble, when other native chieftains were hesitating or hostile, joined our cause with heart and soul, and, raising 2000 Sikhs as an auxiliary force, marched down to Oude, where he fought bravely during the campaign. Sir John Lawrence, who was then Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjaub, had the best opportunities of appreciating the value of this example. On this occasion the Governor-General addressed him as follows:—

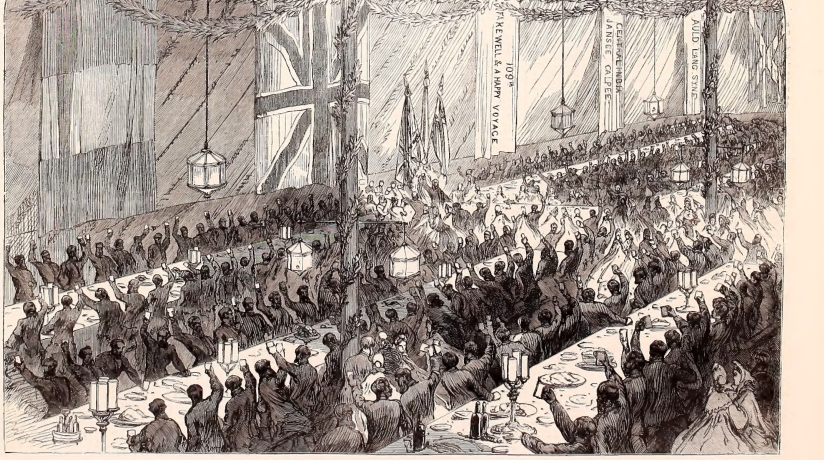
"Rajah Randhir Singh, Rajah of Kapoorthalla,—It is with much satisfaction that I find myself empowered by her most gracious Majesty the Queen of England to confer on you so great a mark of her Royal favour as that of the Star of British India. This honour has only been granted to three princes and chiefs who unite high rank with great personal merit. It rejoices me to instal you among this chosen number.

"Your grandfather, Sirdar Futeh Singh, was a chief of considerable renown. He was the well-known leader of the Ahcowalia Confederacy and the companion in arms of the great Maharajah Runjeet Singh. Your father, Rajah Nihal Singh, was an old friend of mine when you were yet a youth. When he passed away, your Highness succeeded to his duties and his responsibilities, and have worthily discharged them. When the mutiny of 1857 broke out, you were one of the foremost chiefs of this country to do your duty and range yourself on the side of the British Government. After the fall of Delhi your Highness headed your troops, conducted them to Oude, and there assisted in recovering that province. For these services you received at the time much praise and liberal rewards; and now, to crown all, you are about to obtain a most signal mark of honour from her Majesty the Queen of England and India. In the name, then, of the Queen, and by her Majesty's commands, I now invest you with the honourable insignia of the Star of India, of which most exalted order her Majesty has been graciously pleased to appoint you to be a Knight.

"I have addressed you in Hindostanee, in order that the princes and chiefs now present may the more readily participate in this ceremony and that your relatives and friends may be more highly gratified; otherwise I should have spoken in English, for I know that you thoroughly understand my language. This circumstance no doubt has operated as a bond of union between your Highness and my countrymen."

The Rajah made his acknowledgments in due form. He was dressed (says the Lahore Chronicle) in better taste than any other chief at the durbar, simply in white, with blue pajamas; and he wore the blue ribbon of his order.

THE RAJAH OF KAPOORTHALLA, KNIGHT OF THE ORDER OF THE STAR OF INDIA.



ENTERTAINMENT TO THE 109TH REGIMENT AT KURRACHEE.

THE departure of her Majesty's 109th Regiment of the Line from Kurrachee to Aden, in the regular course of relief, took place about the first week in November, when the European residents of Kurrachee gave a farewell entertainment to that gallant corps. The scheme, we hear, originated in Government House, and was taken up warmly throughout the city. Large funds were subscribed in a very short time, and the whole regiment, including the women and children, were invited to dinner. Two long rows of tents, opening one into the other, were pitched, beautifully decorated and lighted for the occasion, her Majesty's 23rd Native Light Infantry paying the pretty compliment of sending their band to entertain their comrades in arms. Some nine hundred persons sat down to the repast provided, which was of the most substantial kind, while the hospitable folks of Kurrachee, both ladies and gentlemen, moved along the ranges of tables to see that their guests were properly served. Cheer after cheer greeted the Divisional Staff and the favourite officers of the corps as they were recognised by the men. The repast over, many of the officers were shouldered and carried over the ground, showing how much they are beloved by the soldiers. There was a magnificent display of fireworks, and then all the women of the corps, with such of the men as desired to join in the amusement, adjourned to the library of the regiment, which had been fitted up for dancing. Here all were as happy as happy could be; no distinctions were made, the field officer was seen gallantly attending the recruit's wife, while the private sentinel led the lady of his captain through the mazes of the quadrille. We have engraved a sketch of the scene in the banqueting-tents. This entertainment took place on Saturday, Nov. 5, and the first party embarked in the Coromandel on the following Monday, for conveyance to Aden.

AUSTRALIA.

(From our own Correspondent.)

MELBOURNE, Oct. 26.—Australian weather is one of those exceptional features in the world's cosmical history which entirely upsets the approved London talk of the signs of the day or night. No one under the thirty-sixth parallel of south latitude remarks to his flabby and dripping friend that "it is a hot day:" the heat pervades all space, and sits on our shoulders like a giant. Per contra, when it comes on to rain, it does rain; and when to blow, it does blow. The only resemblance I can remember to the cannonade of the gale on Friday week last is the crash of a full battery of 32-pounders discharged right at the ear. The next morning the outlying quarters of Sandridge, St. Kilda, and Emerald Hill, three of the seven eminences which make our only resemblance to Ancient Rome, were, as usual, separated from the nominal Melbourne by a few square miles of pond and torrent, which in London in January would set up the whole fraternity of skaters. It is a curious thing that all Australian rivers which bring down an extra aqueous supply from their water-sheds are almost invariably narrow, winding, and deep; and the Yarra, which more resembles the Lea than any English or other stream that I have seen, has a power of sending down a freshwater ocean which is really astonishing. We are getting heartily tired, however, of these invasions; and our Government has at last taken in hand a plan which is to give us dry fields and wet docks for something less than three-quarters of a million sterling—a sum which Lombard-street, to judge by last accounts, may be chary of lending us, but which on five per cent income tax would show to be available at a week's call, and a dozen more to boot. The sensible, the faith in Saxby is deep and universal. The rush after his Calcutta and a chronic repetition of that ever-memorable day when Murphy so successfully predicted the freezing of the Thames, is still fresh in our memories. If the Lieutenant cause not here he would have an ovation not second to Marshall, for an Australian can afford to love Italy in chains for a few years more or less; but there is a matter of vital importance to us, and that is cheap as to the rivers being 21ft. deep or 17ft., and the roads passable or a quagmire. We are a good-sized people, enough to astonish the Yankees; but if you would know what rain does to our roads you must go to the unmade alleys about England two centuries ago.

FAREWELL BANQUET TO THE 109TH REGIMENT AT KURRACHEE.

We have been busy with the elections for the new Parliament during the past few weeks. The Ministry have so managed their proceedings and their proceedings as to secure for it a decided majority; but the majority will prove something like a rope of sand when the occasion for its services arises. At times and seven amongst themselves on some of the most important questions now before the public—one member being for protection another for free trade, and so on—when Parliament meets the fear is that the real business of the country will be retarded through the want of properly mastered practical information on the part of the Government. To give them credit, they are as respectable, able, and honest a set of gentlemen as an extremely limited political community can produce; and it is to be hoped, for the sake of the country, that the sufferings from the lack of good legislation than from anything else—stump orators' statements to the contrary notwithstanding—they will be shown that forbearance and reserve that support which may, perchance, enable them to wiser and better laws.

That the country is in a healthy condition is shown by the revenue-tables, recently published, for the year and quarter ending the 30th of September last. The three months ending the 30th of June show, as compared with the same period of the preceding year, an increase of £178,291; the nine months, a corresponding increase of £223,332; and the twelve months, as compared with the twelve months ending the 30th of September, 1863, an increase of £191,929. As compared with the estimate for the year, there is a prospect by the end of the nine months show a deficiency of £119,108. This, however, is satisfactorily accounted for. In the first quarter we find a falling off of £100,553, caused by the determination of the Ministry not to force unwise sales of bonded goods, and by the reduction of duties taken on water rates accounted for. Then, as yet, there is no revenue due for the nine months from this source is £18,750, which will be raised at a later period of the year. There is also a decrease in the railway income, as compared with the estimate, of £61,691; but if this be not altogether made up during the current three months, the railway officials are confident that the whole will be made good by increased returns arising from the opening of the Echuca Extension, it will be very speedily completed. On the whole, the expenditure of the falling off in the land fund, the present deficiency in the net receipts, as compared with the estimated revenue, is only £48,851, there is every probability that, with the exception of the Echuca Extension, at the close of the year, will find that his estimate has been actually below the real revenue receipts.

The anti-exasperation movement is proceeded as vigorously as ever, and the very candidates for the Parliamentary honours are a new feature in his address. Esquire convicts are being returned to England and the exodus which exists for the purpose is doing its business quietly, but effectually. Mr. Edward Wilson, the proprietor of the Argus, has returned to Europe by the outgoing mail. The rich editor will miss his valuable services; but there is little doubt that when doing the work he has taken in hand, which can probably, at its present stage, be better promoted by his visit to the colonies.

By the ship Monarch, which sailed for London on the 22nd inst., was dispatched the bridal gift of the people of Victoria to her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales. It consists of a gold vase, made of a flower-vase, of beautiful design, exquisite workmanship, and of the finest description which the colony could produce.

The news from Sydney is unsatisfying. Parliament was opened, on the 14th inst., by the Governor, Sir John Young. An amendment to the address was moved by Mr. Cowper, expressing want of confidence in the Ministry. In the course of the debate, which is still pending, disclosures were made which, if substantiated, are seriously damage the Government. Should the Ministry be defeated, it is probable that they will advise a dissolution of the Assembly. It is questionable whether even the throwing overboard of the obnoxious members, who have been forced to resign, will take them over the storm.

Tenders are invited for completing the Southern Railway to Goulburn.

The bushrangers continue to do a little in their peculiar line of business. The notorious Morgan and his gang are still at large—the police, apparently, being quite unable to capture the desperadoes.

Dissolution in Queensland has been dull during the month. The wool season, however, was about to commence, which of course activity was expected. The Colonial Treasurer, Mr. Lacy Moffat, died recently, much regretted by politicians of all shades of opinion. The railway from Ipswich to Dalby is being proceeded with rapidly; a large portion of the plant having already arrived. Steps have been taken for the erection of new Houses of Parliament, the present being carrying out of which will cost £35,000, having been proceeded for adoption.

The German journals announce the death of Prince Frederic of Anhalt-Bernburg, younger brother of the reigning Duke Leopold. The deceased was born in 1796.

The Hereditary Grand Duke of Baden has conferred on the King of Italy and on Prince Humbert the insignia of the Supreme Order of Fidelity, which were delivered by Baron de Seebwetten, the Grand Duke's Minister at the Court of Turin. Baron de Seebwetten had already had an audience of the Annunciation of the Princess of Baden.

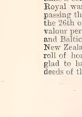
A correspondent of the Times, complaining of the manner in which the telegraphic service between India and England is carried on, says:—"Sending and receiving specimen messages is transmitted:—The following giving and there serve giving and there serve giving and there serve to mention that several portraits adorn his pages—portraits of men with whose features one likes to be familiar.

Legs of the Brass Monsters. Edited and re-arranged by Henry Wright. (1 vol. Houlston and Wright.) This excellent collection of hymns has been improved externally and re-arranged internally, and will prove, in its present form, a highly and agreeable companion for all whom the poetry of pious bards is wont to soothe, to elevate, and to strengthen.

Poems. By the Rev. W. J. Underwood, B.A. (1 vol. Hailsham: Breeds.) The poems are divided into two parts—the first, entitled "Voices from the Fewer and Field," the second, "Life Sketches and other Forms"—the first apparently inspired by observations of external nature, the second, apparently, by experience of men, or by reading, or by philosophical speculation. The author has struck some pleasant chords, has painted some natural scenes, and has coloured them with a faithful hand.



The Handbook of Dining; or, Carpalency and Lectures Scientifically Considered. (Longmans.) That Longmans can set out a handy, and dainty dishes, entitled "La Physiologie du Goût," by the witty French epicure Brillat Savarin, who uttered and swallowed so many good things in his time, and has served up again for the delectation of us, by G. Sumpson, the translator and editor, has selected those portions of the work which seem most likely to be useful, in regard to the choice of wholesome and palatable food, with reference especially to the late controversies provoked by Mr. Banting's popular system. The lively humour of Brillat Savarin, as well as the good sense and propriety of his instructions, will recommend this little handbook to those who have known him as yet only by name. We do not, indeed, agree with all his opinions; but he is a pleasant fellow and has a most agreeable manner of laying down the dietary law.

The Victoria Cross. (O'Byrne Brothers). This little volume contains a complete history of the Order of Valour, beginning with the Royal warrant, issued in January, 1856, instituting the order; and passing thence to an account of its inauguration by her Majesty on the 26th of June, 1857. To this succeeds a narrative of the deeds of valour performed by the members of the order during the Crimean and Baltic campaigns, the India mutinies, and the Persia, China, and New Zealand wars. The two services will be seen to have borne their full roll of honour; and many of the general public will, no doubt, be glad to have at hand, in a compact form, a memorial of the heroic deeds of the knights of this new order of chivalry.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS.

THE EARL OF CARLISLE, K.G.

The illustrious house of Howard has given to this country many graceful examples of nobility, and none more graceful than the good Earl who forms the subject of this notice. He was a happy combination of the statesman, orator, courtier, and scholar. His life, too, was pure and amiable in that whole career presents a noble example of worth, without one shade upon it. Sir George William Frederick Howard, K.G., P.C., seventh Earl of Carlisle, Viscount Howard of Morpeth, Northumberland, Baron Dacre of Gilleland, senior cohelr to the barony of Clifford, under which title a member of the family has been summoned to Parliament, and eldest son of George, sixth Earl of Carlisle, K.G., by his wife, Georgiana, elder daughter of the seventh Earl of Waldegrave, was born in Dover-street, London, on the 18th of April, 1802, and in his youth distinguished himself at Eton College. From Eton he went to Christ Church, Oxford; and, in 1821, obtained the Newdegate prize for English verse (the subject being "Pæstum"), but also the Chancellor's medal for Latin verse (the subject being "Constantinople"). In 1823 he graduated as a first classman in classics, and proceeded M.A. in 1827. In 1825, on his father succeeding to the Earldom of Carlisle, he assumed the title of Morpeth, with which title his earlier political career is familiarly associated. In that year he returned to Parliament for the borough of Morpeth, and took rank as a Liberal. In 1830 he was elected for the West Riding of Yorkshire, which he represented for nearly twenty-one years, from every momentary displeasure of his constituents, he lost his seat; he, however, was returned for Yorkshire shortly and subsequently to the change in the Reform Act, and they gladly re-elected him in 1846. From April, 1841, to September, 1841, Lord Morpeth was Secretary for Ireland under Lord Melbourne, when O'Connell was at the zenith of his power and sought to make himself popular; ship received the message that it was necessary to make himself popular; he also earned lasting credit by his exertions in connection with the Irish Poor Law. In July, 1841, he was appointed Chief Commissioner of Woods and Forests, and held the office till 1850. He succeeded his father, as seventh Earl of Carlisle, in 1848, and was created a Knight of the Garter in 1855. In that year he became, for the first time, Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, and he commenced the most brilliant career of popularity without example among bygone Viceroys, and only approached by his successor. Viceroys in his immediate connection with the change of the Government, in 1858, removed him for a year from the viceroyalty, which was held by the present Lord Clarendon. On the 30th of March, Lord Carlisle returned to Ireland as Lord Lieutenant, for the second time, in 1859, and held the office till 1864, when the pressure of the cares of office, which ill health compelled him to resign it most reluctantly for he had so gained the affections of the Irish people that his retirement was felt as a public calamity, and to be in his government. He had won golden opinions from all sorts of people, for every Irish trait he was known to the backbone, and Irish to be honoured but for the peace and prosperity of Ireland. His departure from that country was a scene of sorrow, and when he crossed the Irish Sea from the shore there was scarcely a dry eye at the parting. The Earl died, shortly after his arrival in London, and was buried in the family vault of Kingsland and Ireland, and by his relatives and his host of friends, with all of whom he knew how to live as a friend. The Earl of Morpeth, and the people who are almost too good-natured, had scarcely full notice rendered to his sterling worth. Yet there was not wanting the intimately conversant of his great powers of mind and judgment, and this was on one occasion manifestly and generously acknowledged by the late Sir Robert Peel, when in the Commons by his political opponent, Mr. Disraeli. The Earl was certainly a living answer to the hackneyed question that a sincere clergyman seized and amalgamate with the people. Of blood the purest and connection the highest in the realm, there was no assumption of pride, no affectation of rank, and he never failed to win welcome and affection whether in the palace or the hut, and the public cheers that greeted him as he passed through the city was his frequent wont and pleasure to visit familiarly. His sociality ay as much a feature in his public as in his private life. He was a man who was not exceeded by his next surviving brother, the Hon. and Rev. William George Howard, of Castle Howard, Yorkshire, by the Hon. Frederick Howard, of Corby Castle, Cumberland, and by the late Lady Mary Howard, who died unmarried, and has left and now eighth Earl of Carlisle, who was born, 1st, 1843, and has held the courtesy title of Lord Morpeth, of which dignity is unmarried, the birthrigh presumptive to the noble title. Besides, by his marriage with the late Lady Dover, the Countess Granville, Baroness R.R., who born in 1809, married, in 1842, Elias, only daughter of the Hon. Leveson Granville Proby and granddaughter of William Bradshaw, first Lord Ponsonby. The Earls of Carlisle are a branch of the great family of Howard, Dukes of Norfolk, and Earls Marshal of England, and at the end of the sixteenth century through the second son of Thomas, fourth Duke of Norfolk, Lord William Howard, Warden of the Western Marches, known as Belted Will Howard, whose great-grandson, Charles Howard, an eminent diplomatist, was created Earl of Carlisle on April 30, 1661. From the first Earl the title has passed from father to son, through a succession of leading and highly estimable noblemen, most of them Knights of the Garter, to the Earl just dead; and it is now for the first time that the family honours are inherited by a brother. The mortal remains of Lord Carlisle were deposited, on the 13th inst., in the mausoleum of his ancestors, in the park of Castle Howard. Pursuant to his own dying wish, there was no pomp or show displayed at his funeral; but the vast and sorrowful congregation attending of people of all ranks and degrees, many of them, apparently, even strangers, marked how mourned was the loss and how respected the memory of the gentle Earl.

SIR JAMES MATHEW STRONGE.

Sir James Mathew Stronge, D.C.L., second Baronet of Tynan Abbey, in the county of Armagh, Deputy Lieutenant for that county and the county of Tyrone, a gentleman of the Privy Chamber, who died at his seat, Tynan Abbey, on the 1st inst., was the only son by survivor issue of the late Sir James Stronge, the first Baronet, by his wife, Helen, daughter and coheir of John Pyre, Esq., and great grandniece of John, first Lord Farnham (by her second marriage, Mrs. Holmes). He was born on the 9th of April, 1786. He succeeded his father as second Baronet in 1804. He married, on the 5th of September, 1810, Isabella, eldest daughter of Nicholson Calvert, Esq., of Hunsdon, Herts, M.P. for Hertfordshire, by his wife (who died on the 14th of August, 1864), Lady Caroline Percy, daughter and coheir (with her sister, the Duchess of Northumberland) of Hugh, second Viscount Fey. By this marriage Sir James had seven sons and three daughters. The eldest son Frances Helen, wife of Thomas Vesey Nugent, Esq., nephew of Thomas, present Viscount Caroline, wife of Captain William Banbury M'Clintock, R.N.; and Catherine Isabella, wife of Archdeacon Stopford, Rector of Aghaderg. Sir James Stronge was highly popular among his tenantry, and he will be much and deservedly lamented. He was a liberal landlord, a kind master, a supporter of the active and useful parts of both the dignities of the county of Tyrone and of Armagh, and a gentleman of the old school. He succeeded his father as third Baronet on the 19th of March, 1834. He served, on the 5th of September, 1810, Isabella, eldest daughter of Nicholson Calvert, Esq., of Hunsdon, Herts, M.P. for Hertfordshire, by his wife (who died on the 14th of August, 1864), Lady Caroline Percy, daughter and coheir (with her sister, the Duchess of Northumberland) of Hugh, second Viscount Fey. He succeeded his father as third Baronet on the 19th of March, 1834. He served in the Royal Tyrone Fusiliers. He was born in 1811, and married, in 1836, Selina Elizabeth, eldest daughter of Andrew Nugent, Esq., and sister of Viscount De Vesci. This family is a branch of the very ancient house of Strong or Strange, of Strange Hall, in Cheshire, and, in 1815, Sarah, acquired considerable estates in Ireland in the beginning of the last century. His barony of Conlifferd was created in 1800, the Rev. George, the then representative of the line, and father of the Baronet just deceased.

JOSEPH BUREKE, ESQ.

Joseph Burke, Esq., J.P., of Elm Hall, in the county of Tipperary, whose death occurred on the 12th inst., at his native town hereof, Templemore, place, Dublin, was the son of Peter Burke, Esq., of Elm Hall, by his wife, Anne, second daughter and heiress of Matthew Smith, Esq., M.D., and sister of Colonel Matthew Barnewall, Esq., of the Barewalls, Barosets, of Cricklestown Castle, in the county of Meath. Mr. Joseph Burke succeeded to the estate of Elm Hall, which he had been called to the Irish Bar in 1832, and was in fair practice, when, in 1839 he was appointed Clerk of the Crown and Peace, a position which, at the introduction of the poor law into Ireland. He filled that office very ably for fifteen years, and retired on a full pension, in 1854. Mr. Burke married, on the 18th of February, 1836, Miss Mary Anne Bellingham, a lady of high and acquired considerable estates in Ireland in the beginning of the last century. His barony of Conlifferd was created in 1800, the Rev. George, the then representative of the line, and father of the Baronet just deceased.

M. MOQUARD.

M. Constant Moquard, private friend and devoted ally of the Empress Eugénie, died, on the 8th inst., at the age of 58, in his retirement at Passy. M. Moquard, who was a man of letters as well as a great political celebrity, was born in Besançon, on Nov. 11, 1791. He was educated at the college of that place, where he achieved distinction as a scholar. In 1817, having then simply a licentiate of law, he gave proof of his courage in the struggle he made in the defence of several political offenders, and acted effectively in conjunction with the eminent French barristers, Dupin and Berryer. During the last few years he continued to make advances towards forensic fame, being engaged in several causes célèbres. In 1848 he was elected by his native town to quit the Bar in 1849, after which period, till 1860, he lived in retirement. In the latter year he was appointed by the late Count Walewski Besançon, and in 1863 he was elected by the Imperial cause. When Napoleon became Emperor Napoleon in London, in 1840, soon after his arrival from Switzerland, and afterwards returned to Paris in company with Louis Napoleon, whose one of the journals devoted to the Imperial cause. When Napoleon became President, M. Moquard was appointed Secretary to the Empress. He was officially, having also conferred on him the title of Chef-de-Cabinet. Previous to carrying out the numerous coups d'état for which the Empress prepared his plan to his trusty secretary, who has ever since been his constant friend, and, at his request, drew up the famous proclamation of the 2nd of December. He wrote articles for the "Biographie Universelle," to which he contributed the lives of the Empress and the Prince Imperial. He also brought out a large collection of "Nouvelles Causes Célèbres," published in 1858.

M. LEFÈVRE-CACHELEU.

M. Lefèvre-Cacheleu, K.C.B., Colonel-Commandant Royal Artillery, died yesterday week, at Monie House, Aberdeenshire, where he was born, 1780.

Major-General William Negens died at his residence, at Dover, on Thursday week. He was the third son of Sir Evan Nepean, first Baronet, and was born in 1795.

WILLS AND BEQUESTS.

The will of Baron Du Bois de Ferrieres, of Chepstow, Monmouthshire, was proved in the London Court by his son, Charles Conrad Adolphus Baron de Ferrieres, the sole executor, the personal estate being sworn the settlement on his marriage, and leaves to his wife, the Baroness Du Bois, an annuity of £1,000, and the residence, Ty Mawr, for her life, and leaves the plate, pictures, books, &c. this relict and sister-in-law electing what they may desire to have. The testator left a large sum to charitable uses. To his son, the Baron, besides a legacy of £3000, has bequeathed a moiety of the residue of the estate, the remainder going to the three other children of his late daughter Augusta, widow of the late Rev. J. Bright.

The will of the late Mrs. Elizabeth Mary Gee, of Hyde Parkgardens, who died on the 1st of November, has just been proved in the London Court under £80,000, the whole of which she has bequeathed to her only son.

The Department of Agriculture and Statistics at Quebec has issued the following statistics of crops in Canada for the year to the 15th of October, and gives the nationalities of the immigrants as follows:—English, 2,774; Irish, 1,402; Scotch, 1,402; Germans, 1,402; Norwegians and Swedes, 648; Danes, 129; Belgians, 118; and Americans, nationalities. A great increase is shown in the yield of wheat, barley, and oats over the corresponding period of the previous year. Nearly two thirds of the immigrants remained in Canada.

An important despatch from Colonel Finniss, Government Resident at the new settlement of Escape Cliffs, has been received announcing the arrival of the expedition sent out by the Government of South Australia at Adam's Bay, on the 25th of September, and bringing with it intelligence of a very satisfactory report of the prospects of the new settlement.—" Depôt, Escape Cliffs, Sept. 25.—Sir,—I have the honour to report for your information the formation of purchasers of land in the north territory, South Australia, that the expedition—consisting of the following persons—Messrs. Goyder, C.E.; Mr. Henry Ellis, Captain Phillips, and the Yatala, Captain Humbert (Government steamer)—has arrived safely at this settlement on the 25th September, the month of June last. I have established a depôt at Escape Cliffs, a few miles south of Cape Jaffa-pan, and have to report that in the course of about a month, I am unable to say where the site of the town will be, but probably the Lake Bonney. The Government steamer will remain here for ships of any burden, with the aid of a steam-tug, and there is abundance of fine land on the Lake Bonney. From the appearance of the country inhabit three some every reason to believe that wool can be produced in paying abundance, and that all descriptions of cattle will thrive. The soil is suited to tropical vegetation generally, and, if the climate permit, its rich enough and varied enough for many extra tropical productions, especially such as succeed in South Australia. The early departure of the mail forbids my giving longer particulars.—I have, &c., (signed) W. Finniss." From the Admiralty, Commander Hutchinson having sent charts and explanations home by this expedition, and from the Colonial Office the despatch.

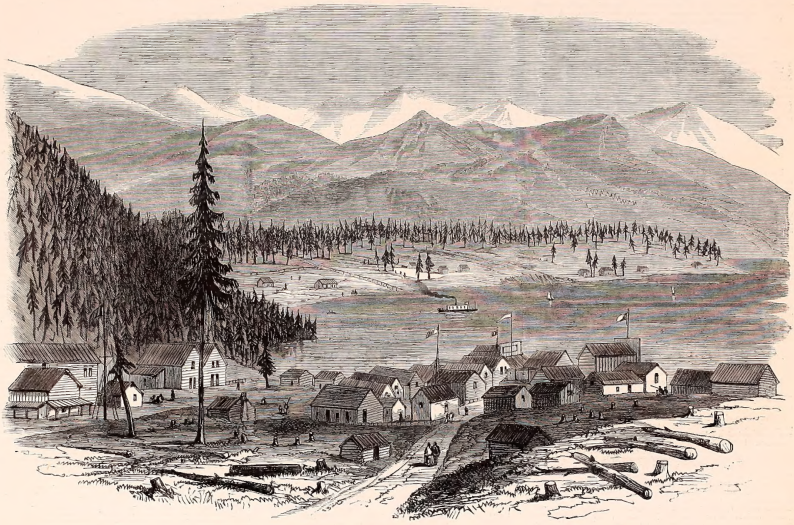
SKETCHES IN BRITISH COLUMBIA.

SCENE AT THE FOUNTAIN NEAR PARSONVILLE, FRASER RIVER.

THE famous Cariboo gold-diggings in British Columbia are approached by two different roads from New Westminster, the port and capital of that province, near the mouth of the Fraser River. One way is to ascend the Fraser River as far as Fort Yale; the other way is to go up Harrison River, which enters the Fraser River from the northward, fifty miles above New Westminster. Harrison River flows out of Harrison Lake, a fine piece of fresh water, about forty miles long; and the head of Harrison Lake communicates with a smaller lake, on the shores of which is situated the little town of Douglas, whence this water also takes its name. The scenery around these two lakes is Alpine and picturesque, as may be seen in the Views we have engraved from original sketches.



The View of Harrison Lake is taken from a small bay looking down that lake, about fifteen miles from Douglas. In the centre is an island eight miles in length, known as Long Island. In the distance are a portion of the Cascade Mountains and Mount Baker, an active volcano, situated in Washington Territory, which belongs to the United States. Both the shores of the lake and the islands are covered with rocks, amidst which is some stunted pine timber.

Another Engraving gives a view of the town of Douglas. The site where this town now stands was, before the gold fever began, in 1858, a dense forest of gigantic pines. Soon after this it became known to the Government that a practicable line of road could be made from this spot, between the northernmost spur of the Cascade Mountains and the coast range, to intersect the line of the Fraser, some considerable distance inland. A large party of men was organised and sent up for that purpose. In a few hours after their arrival a town site was selected, and the woods resounded with the strokes of the axe. Since that period, clearing has steadily progressed, and the busy little town of Douglas, with its wide streets laid out at right angles and partially cleared, begins to assume an air of civilisation, though its houses are generally still of the most primitive wooden order of architecture. Douglas, however, being at the head of the up-river navigation along this route, has become the most important depôt for the inland traffic of the colony. The advantages of this route both for passengers and transport of goods, are, that between Douglas and Lillooet, the point where it strikes the Fraser, a distance of 112 miles, a good waggon-road has been constructed, which with the aid of water-carriage along four lakes, a length of fifty-four miles in all, navigated by small steamers, makes the transit easy and expeditious. For the conveyance of passengers to and fro a daily line of four-horse stages has during the last twelve months been in full operation; and for goods traffic a great number of heavy waggons, drawn by oxen and mules, are kept in constant employment besides several trains of pack-mules, and one of camels. Nearly 3000 tons of goods were transported over this route last year. Owing to the want of any land near Douglas suitable for agricultural pursuits, its population is limited to few more than those who are engaged in store-keeping and forwarding goods to the upper country. It has a sawmill, several smiths' and carpenters' shops, kept fully employed, and, like all mining towns, has its due proportion of hotels, restaurants, and billiard saloons. A neat little English church is its only religious institution. Law and justice are administered by a stipendiary magistrate, whose residence is shown in the left corner of the Engraving.

The subject of another Illustration is an Indian village on the shore of Douglas Lake, inhabited by 200 or 300 people of the Quit-Squaws tribe, who, like all those to be met with on this route, are peaceable, intelligent, and industrious, often rendering great assistance to the traveller by carrying his baggage over the land portages. During certain seasons of the year many of these Indians are employed to convey freight up the Lillooett river, which for twenty-nine miles runs parallel with the Douglas waggon-road. Its navigation would be extremely dangerous, but the Indian, having from infancy been trained to steer his beautiful clipper-shaped canoe amidst snags, boulders, and eddies, very rarely meets with a mishap. Their dwellings are of the rudest construction, built of posts and rough cedar-slabs, scarcely wind or water tight. The interior is generally one large room, occupied by many families, each grouped round its own separate fire; and, having no chimney or outlet for smoke, except through interstices of the slab-covered roof, their condition, with the smell from dried salmon stowed away on the beams by thousands, contrasts greatly with our ideas of comfort. The people are sociable in their habits, and, having lately been converted to Christianity, very strict in their observances of the Sabbath. The clothing of the old folks consist chiefly of Hudson's Bay blankets, or the skins of wild animals found on the mountains; but the younger ones have long since adopted white people's attire, generally choosing the most showy colours.

The Fountain, eight miles from Furseville, which is in quite another district, on the other side of the Frazer River, is well known as one of the prettiest spots on that line of road. Here is to be found one mile in length, surrounded by romantic mountains, which give it the appearance of a vast amphitheatre. The soil is rich, but very light and sandy, the owner of the roadside inn manages to grow good crops of grain, potatoes, and—what is more extraordinary in those high latitudes—water-melons, a great boon to the traveller.

MUSIC.

No novelty has been produced at either of the great musical theatres since our last notice of their proceedings. At present, we presume, they are occupied, like all the other theatres in town, in preparing for their Christmas pantomimes. At Covent Garden, we understand, the next novelties will be an English version of Gounod's new opera, "Le Médecin Malgré lui," and an opera by M. G. A. Osborne, At Her Majesty's Theatre (except the pantomime) nothing new is announced.

The Sacred Harmonic Society gave a splendid performance of "Judas Maccabæus" on Wednesday, last week. Mr. Sims Reeves was disabled by the continued indisposition from singing on that unfortunate occurrence as all times, but especially in the case of this oratorio, in which his unrivalled vocal powers are displayed in their highest form. Many people thoughtlessly rent their spleen against Mr. Reeves for the frequent disappointments caused by his absence on such occasions. They do not consider that he is probably the greatest sufferer. His health is not robust, and his voice is a very delicate organ, easily affected by the influences of the weather. We know that it grieves him the greatest pain to fail in fulfilling his engagements, and that it is only when compelled by absolute necessity that he does so. On the present occasion Mr. Wilbye Cooper acted as Mr. Reeves's substitute, and acquitted himself with his usual ability. The other solo vocalists were sung by Mdme. Lemmens-Sherrington, Miss Banks, Mdme. Sainton-Dolby, Mr. Montem Smith, and Mr. Weiss. The first Christmas performance of "The Messiah" took place last night.

The Musical Union Choral Society commenced its season with a performance at Exeter Hall of Mendelssohn's "Elijah" on Wednesday last, under the direction of Mr. G. W. Martin. We shall give some account of it next week.

There was a classical chamber concert of unusual excellence on Tuesday evening, the 6th inst., at the Manor Rooms, Hackney. It was the second of a series of concerts, modelled on the plan of the celebrated "Monday Popular Concerts," and resembling them in the high order of the music selected and the excellence of the execution. The programme included Mendelssohn's sonata in D, for the piano and violoncello; Beethoven's trio in B flat, for the piano, violin, and violoncello—the grandest specimen in existence of this class of composition; and a quartet for two violins, viola, and violoncello, by Mr. E. Prout. Each piece gained the warmest applause of the locality of British Musicians in 1862, and is a work of extraordinary merit. It was admirably played by Messrs. Amor and Betjemann (violins), Mr. Burrell (viola), and Mr. Edward Howell (violoncello), and received great applause; the scherzo being loudly and unanimously encored. Mr. Arthur Exton, the son of our great contra-bassist, made his first and only promises to emulate his father on his own instrument but has great vocal talent—sang Wallace's fine song "Scots Wha Be Bellringer," in a manner which created a marked sensation. Mr. Betjemann played Sainton's fantasia on "Il Figlia del Reggimento" with great effect, and Mrs. Annette Hirst was deservedly applauded in the great scena from "Der Freischutz" and in Mozart's beautiful "Forget me not." This excellent and successful concert is another proof of the progress of musical taste and refinement in this country.

The rehearsals of Meyerbeer's posthumous work "L'Africaine" are going on briskly at the Grand Opera, and the public is looking for its production with great interest. The rehearsals are superintended by M. Jules Beer, the celebrated musical historian and critic.

Wagner's opera "Rienzi" has been produced at Cologne in a style of almost unequalled splendour. The public were divided in their opinion as to the merits. They were agreed as to the mise en scène and the excellence of the performance.

THE THEATRES.

The theatres may now be said to have closed for the season, so far as new pieces is concerned. Drury Lane will conclude its labours on Monday and Tuesday, when a "Grand Selection" will be performed. On the following Monday the annual pantomime will be produced. Of course Mr. E. L. Blanchard is the author, and Mr. William Beverley the artist. It will be entitled "Hop o' My Thumb and the Three Wicked Brothers; or, Harlequin and the Seven-League Boots." Morning performances of it will be given during the week. Mr. Creswick took his benefit on Thursday in "Othello," on which occasion Mr. Phelps performed Iago.

Mdlle. Beatrice, on Tuesday, returned to the character of Mdlle. De Belle Isle, and has sustained it during the week. The musical entertainment of "A Song, No Supper" has been revived at the Haymarket. The Christmas entertainment will consist of a fairy burlesque by Mr. H. J. Byron, entitled "Cinderella; or, Harlequin and Aslumey for his fable—one not yet employed for stage purposes.

At the Princess' we are promised a new pantomime extravaganza, with some splendid scenery by Mr. F. Lloyds, and by Mr. Pearson "Robert Mesmaire" will be revived. Mr. Fechter will also appear in a new one-act drama which has been especially written for his benefit. The Olympic will adopt a classical burlesque, called "Cupid and Psyche, by Mr. Burnand.

The pantomime at Sadler's Wells will be based on a local theme, and entitled "Sir Hugh Mydelton; or the Fairy of the Crystal Stream." The tale of the Sadler's Wells pantomime will be blended with that of the great projector of the New River.

The Strand will be supplied by Mr. H. J. Byron with a burlesque entitled "The Grin Bushes." The same author also has been engaged for the Royalty. The subject of the piece will be classical.

Mr. Brough will provide for the St. James's pantomime under Miss Herbert's management. The story of the burlesque will be mythological, and connected with "Puss in Boots."

The Surrey is provided with an historical pantomime relative to "Richard Cœur de Lion," which Sadye is supplied by Mr. Greenwood with a pantomime on "Jack Sprat." The Victoria affects the marvellous, under the auspices of "Baron Munchausen."

The Standard is likewise active in preparation. The Standard pantomime is entitled "Dame Durden and her Five Servant-maids; or, Robinson Crusoe and Richard with Two Pretty Men." The City of London will, of course, be supplied by the veteran Nelson Lee with his last best pantomime. The Effingham will be provided, as usual, by Mr. George Conquest, with one of his unique and seasonable productions.

The Marylebone has announced a pantomime, under the title of "The Bronze Horse."

The success of all these theatres during the past season has been far above the average.

We may add to this list that a pantomime will be performed at the Royal English Opera, the old subject of "Cinderella; or, Harlequin and the Magic Pumpkin, and the Great Fairy of the Little Glass Slipper" forming the theme and title; while at Her Majesty's a fairy entertainment will be given, called "The Lion and the Unicorn Fighting for the Crown," on which the pen of Mr. Byron has been employed.

CHESS.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

T. ELLIS, HARROW, OXFORD, B. B., AND OTHERS.—The conditions of Problem No. 1845 should be "White to play, and give mate in four moves." Before your and others failure.

T. G., HORNEY.—Mr. Blackburne, an English player, and Mr. Paulsen, a German one, have played a "consultation game" against Messrs. Löwenthal, without result, as I declared.

FAUST.—In the position submitted, white ought to win easily.

J. LEE, MANCHESTER.—Your solution of Problem No. 1844 received with attention. 2. Yes; Mr. Bartle's problem is good, but it is very transitive also.

DERBENSIS, NEW PANS.—It cannot be accomplished under four moves. "Three" was a typical misprint. Your solutions are correct.

W. T. HOWGRAVE.—The keyboard of Eulgine 169 is 1, Q to Q Sq. That of Eulgine 1822 is 1, K to Kt Sq.

BOLTON.—1. Such a position is possible. 2. The first move in the Solution of Eulgine 1 is K to Kt Sq. That of 1414 we advise you to try and discover for yourself.

J. W. MINSHULL.—See solution to "J" Eulgine 169.

J. BOSWORTH.—Many thanks. A more judicious one of plagiarism was never heard of; it is a "chestnut" of considerable age, and has been frequently exposed. Are you acquainted with Mr. Bilguer's work on the openings?

ARTHUR BUK.—We believe it can be solved as you suggest.

CYRIL.—You are mistaken. Mr. Staunton is not a contributor.

TOM, TOM, AND OTHERS.—The collected edition of the late "L. B." problems is nearly ready, and will be announced in this column shortly.

A. B. C.—We know not as well as our London friends.

CRITIC, M. P., Greenhaus, D. D.—You are quite right.

LANCE.—Those problems which in the normal of mate is position. Instead of White giving mate in three moves, he cannot possibly mate the game.

G. S.—Your solution of Problem No. 1844 is correct, though we suspect they are not the first.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

Nos. 1293, 1294.—VOL. XLV. SATURDAY, DECEMBER 24, 1864. THREE SHEETS AND COLOURED SUPPLEMENT 1s.

CHRISTMAS.

It is the leading feature of the annual festival which the country is about to enjoy that it bears on it the impress and the flush of youth. The social system gets into a ring which joins in one concentric chain all ages, from babyhood to septuagenarianism. Practical work-o'-day England becomes especially lively, and resolves itself into decent joviality. Christmas is our real national holiday, much more so than Easter, with its promise, more or less fulfilled, of sunshine and out-of-door enjoyment. None so poor as not to bear a good heart on that day at least, and none so rich as not to partake in its conventional observances. The sociable and the solitary, the polished and the rude, wisdom and folly, yield alike to the influences of the hour; and men, women, and children "drink at every pore the spirit of the season." It is the moment for the free and cordial communication of good-humour in every circle. It is as it were the ushering in of the year in its expectations, and, whatever may be the ill-fortune of its termination, it still gives pleasure to the hopeful. It is the opening promise of many of our fellow-beings before disappointment has checked their alacrity or given them cause for alarm; and, however doubtful and uncertain may be the realisation of many a confidence born at this period, it is still pleasant to contemplate in the young and ardent the sensations of expectation; that expectation which as much as, or even more than, the fervour and buxomness of the blood, makes our early days so delightful. This is, perhaps, the only real occasion on which we grave, plodding islanders, as a body, wind ourselves up to a point where we are to cast off care; for, after all, the phrase "Christmas bills" is an incorrect one, as those stern realities never appear until the new year, when every one has settled down again into his normal condition of laborious routine, and every one accepts the payment of the bills as a proper penalty for a day or two of friskiness on the part of a nation of workers. Christmas is, in fact, a grand breaking up, not for boys and girls alone—everybody takes holiday.

There is, moreover, a special peculiarity attaching to this particular epoch of relaxation. If it is not in every case as it ought to be, the season of reconciliation and of the knitting up of the ravelled sleeve of dissension, it is, at any rate, the season of reunion, and, above all, it is the very saturnalia of children. One of the most pleasing sights at this festive time is the inevitable and ever-recurring groups of young folk that pervade every scene. On whose gay will, clusters of their joyous chubby faces present themselves to your notice. In the streets, at the exhibitions, the toy-fairs, the theatres, we are pleasantly jostled by eager urchins bent on appropriating as much as possible of the delights of their holiday. In watching these their elders renew their youth, and enjoy the shows of the season by their sympathy with the vivacious demonstrations of ingenuous boyhood and girlhood. Few occasions perhaps afford better opportunity for the guardians of the lives and fortunes of their charges to study their temperaments and specialities in the development of their characters. Those little ones, their joyousness, their gambols, their sports, embodying as they do the absence of care and the blotting out for the time of thoughts of the future, are the crowning glory of Christmas.

Another great feature of the short period which we afford to relaxation at this particular juncture ought to be, and to a great extent is, the universality of its influence and enjoyment. Amidst the rejoicings which time-honoured custom bids us promote it should not be, and happily in a great many instances it is not, forgotten that the season has duties as well as its pleasures. Every one is bound—and those who deny or neglect the obligation are probably exceptions—to do what in him lies to chase away, as far as possible, any dark shadows which may be resting on many homes and on the hearts of many who, literally as well as figuratively, are not housed. There is room to be revelry in the well-lighted and well-warmed mansions of the opulent, and mirth and cheerfulness in the more modest but not less comfortable abodes of middle-class life. But if we could or would listen at the doors of the sad hovels of the destitute we might hear the low wailings of helplessness and the groans of sorrow and of suffering. The rich fare sumptuously, the possessors of competency and the employed workers fare plenteously; but in the vicinity of these classes there are iniquity who, at the nightfall of that day of mild-winter which is consecrated to mirth and joy, can hardly discern the coal-heaver, or creep, with their famishing offspring, into cheerless resting-places, and in the sleep of exhaustion endeavour to forget their misery until the waking hour of the morning. The words "homeless poor" are, even at this time of boundless wealth and increasing prosperity of the nation, a reproach and a libel in the ears of us all. It has been even necessary for the Legislature to step in and take measures in some degree to mitigate this terrible evil, which stands so gaunt and hideous on the outer circle of our civilisation. Few of us but can, in this degree, do something to aid in this matter. Those who are clothing the naked, feeding the hungry, and averting the rigour of the season from the needy; and we know no better ingredient than this in the recipe for securing a merry Christmas.

But, while alluding to this, which must be taken as a drawback on that unity of enjoyment which is the principle, and in the main may be assumed to be the fact, as the characteristic of Christmas-tide, it would be unjust not to acknowledge the existence of a wide-spread benevolence as a special feature of the occasion. Patent and, so to speak, legalised poverty is cared for liberally in the workhouses, and there is such festivity as can be got up in such ungenial dwelling-places; but there is many a hearth outside those buildings in which are lodged those who qualify for admission by the utter helplessness of pauperism, where the fire would be low, and the exhalations of the animal Christmas-pudding would be wanting but for the exercise of that charity which, thoughtful as it may be bounded, is so largely exercised by individuals at this period of the year in this country. It is to be hoped that this year the demand will not be so great as has been the case in years gone by; but, whatever it may be, there is no doubt but that the sympathies of those who can give will not be found wanting. Such a course as this, judiciously pursued on the one hand and rightly appreciated on the other, will do much to inspire all classes with the courage and unity of purpose with which it may be necessary for us as a people to meet the coming year. To be sure, no serious prospect of evil or difficulty looms in the future; but that is no reason why every one of us should not do something towards the promotion of that general community of good feeling which ought to animate us as a nation, and which should render the spirit which will pervade the gatherings together of family circles an illustration and a type of the harmonious union of the country at large.

There is one point in reference to the Christmas of this year which makes its peculiar, and which ought to induce considerate action on the part of the class of employers. The fact that Christmas Day and Sunday are coincident necessarily operates to cut off the reality of the holiday which everyone desires to enjoy. We have in this country but few days of relaxation, and it is very difficult, if not impossible, for our working-classes to dissociate a day's pleasure from the loss of a day's gains. We believe that arrangements are being universally made to raise Monday next to be an equivalent for the festal day which has been absorbed into the Sunday. It is sincerely to be hoped that this design will be so carried out that that numerous class who are dependent on daily wages may be able to accept the boon of a day's cessation from toil without incurring the penalty of a fine of a day's pay. If this can be done, let us hope that, so far as the chances and varieties of human affairs will permit, every one will partake of that which is meant and embodied in the suggestive phrase—a Merry Christmas!

A despatch has been received by Earl Russell notifying the conclusion of the peace of Italia and Paysandu, belonging to the Republic of Uruguay, by the naval forces of Brazil.

THE LATE ACTION AT SIMONOSAKI, JAPAN.

The last mail has brought us a number of sketches by Mr. Wirgman, and photographs by Signor Beato, of Yokohama, to serve as further illustrations of the conflict they witnessed on the 5th and 6th of September, between the allied British, French, and Dutch squadrons and the batteries and land forces of the Prince of Nagato. As we have already published on two occasions sketches of the scene of the fight, a brief sketch in the Strait of Simonoseki, it may suffice to give a couple of engravings in the present Number. The subject of one is the unopposed capture of the Lower Battery, close to the shore, about seven o'clock in the evening of Sept. 5, by Captain Kingston, of her Majesty's ship Tartar, and Commander Tatnall, of the United States ship Modoua, with about twenty men. Finding that the battery had been abandoned by the Japanese, the seamen gave a parting salute to the guns, and returned without molestation to their ships. The other illustration, which appears on our front page, shows the interior of one of the batteries taken on the next day. It is occupied by the French from the Semiramis. The Japanese guns are pointed as embrasures, and the carriages are cut to suit the carriages in the wise of Japanese manufacture. In the background we see a few of the English officers looking on. Captain Alexander, of the Encounter, is standing next to the man with the flag. This seems to be the few hours before the conflict in which Captain Alexander and Lieutenant Colvill Seeley, with the sailors and marines under their command, were engaged in the evening of the 5th, when they stormed and walked through the stockade in the wooded ravine just above this position, as shown in a former illustration.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.

The Moniteur announces that the Emperor and Empress will receive the Corps Diplomatique as usual at the Tuileries on the last of the present month, the customary Levée on the 1st, and the Ball on the 3rd.

A short time ago it was stated that a proposal had been laid before the Emperor to take away from the Senate and the Corps Législatif the right of voting the addresses in reply to the Speech from the Throne. It is now said that the Emperor has, after due consideration, set aside the proposal altogether.

The complete works of M. Mocquard are announced for immediate publication.

Last week the Imperial Library witnessed a curious scene—the reception by the Minister of Instruction of a legacy left by the Marquis de Lagoy, a native of this empire, the town of Voghera, which is now subsisted as in a temple, surrounded by the works which were hastily brought from Italy by the Marquis. The Minister of Finance has erected to Voltaire "in one of the smaller rooms of the library.

A pension of 12,000f. (£480) is to be conferred upon the widow of Admiral Bruat, who died at Sebastopol.

The Academy of "Inscriptions and Belles Lettres" has chosen Mr. Edwin Norris, a distinguished Orientalist of London, in the place of Baron de Witte, promoted to the office of foreign associate.

The works for improving the navigation of the Seine between Paris and Rouen are being carried on with great activity.

The Government has charged M. Jouan, one of the pupils of the French Academy at Rome, to go to Kertch, in the Crimea, on a mission in the East. He has left for Alexandria.

The Moniteur de l'Armée announces that 140 French sailors have been decorated by the Emperor of China with his new order of the Dragon, for their services against the Taepings. The first medal was dispatched to the widow of the late Admiral Protet.

SPAIN.

The Ministerial crisis has been brought to a close by the recall of General Narvaez and his entire Cabinet, the attempt of General Isturiz, as well as all others, to construct a new Administration having proved abortive.

ITALY.

General Della Marmora made a short speech in the Representative Chamber, last Saturday, on the necessity of economy, in order to guarantee the future prosperity of Italy, for the maintenance of the army. He stated that considerable reduction of public expenditure should be commenced, but that these reductions would not affect the defences of the country.

The provisional budget for the first three months of 1862 was agreed to on Monday. The Chamber then adjourned to Jan. 6.

Five shocks of earthquake were felt at Florence on the 12th inst.

The Neapolitan army, on the peace footing, is maintained by twenty days' imprisonment and a fine of 140f. for an article offensive to the Emperor of the French.

PRUSSIA.

The Guards who were engaged in the Danish War entered Berlin on Saturday last. A large concourse of people assembled to witness their arrival, and receive them with hearty cheers. The King made a speech, in which he said that the Guards added a new leaf to their glorious history. He announced that medals of commemoration would be struck for the Guards and the regiments of regiments who had borne a part in the assaults on Düppel and Alsen.

GREECE.

The Government is again threatened with a crisis. The Foreign Ministers have refused to grant passports to persons applying for them.

Despatches from Messina report that disturbances had broken out in Zante from political causes, and that several persons had been wounded.

AMERICA

The United States Congress assembled at Washington on the 9th inst., but the President's Message was not communicated until the 6th.

Mr. Lincoln declares that no measures to oppose with the South can result in any good, as the South will not be satisfied with any conditions but a severance of the Union, which the North cannot and will not grant. The Southerners can, he adds, defeat their own ends over they choose by laying down their arms and submitting to the authority of the law. He will recommend that the slaves raised in rebellious districts be declared free, and that the Union will not compensate them. The Message then proceeds to speak of the finances, which are in a healthy condition, although unfavourable symptoms have arisen in British and Brazilian ports, and on the northern frontier of the United States. Foreign exports in the past year exceeded imports, and that, therefore, the six months' notice stipulated by treaty for abrogating the Reciprocity Treaty with Canada is not to be given. The Message then proceeds to speak of the foreign relations of the country, which are in a satisfactory state. Mr. Lincoln declares that the Government will not recognise the independence of the Southern Confederacy, and that it will not be the first power to do so. He says that the Government will not be the first power to do so. He says that the Government will not be the first power to do so. He says that the Government

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

The Master and Wardens of the Company of Salters gave a dinner in their hall, in St. Swithin's-lane, yesterday week, to a distinguished party, of which Rear-Admiral Sir Thomas Hastings, C.B., Superintendent and Chief of the Chatham Fleet, was the principal guest. Joseph Sely, Esq., the master, occupied the chair.

On Thursday week, at a crowded public meeting held at the Beaumont Institution, Mile-end, measures were adopted to establish an industrial exhibition of the working classes of East London. A. S. Ayrton, Esq., M.P., presided, and amongst those present were the Rev. T. T. Rowsell, the Rev. J. Sortain, Mr. Macready, and Mr. Murphy.

The Art-Union of London this year presents each subscriber with a fine line engraving by Mr. R. Sands, A.R.A., after W. F. Witherington, of the incident in the life of Claude Duval, when that chivalrous robber, having stopped a lady's coach, in which there is £300, and learning the attendants in order for a dance with the fair owner upon the heath as a condition upon which he will bestow it on the lady.

"The Yeoman and the Parks" has begun to figure as a heading in the daily journals. The ornamental waters in the parks have been partially drained, and, as usual, the mud has been left in heaps, and private have received a thorough drenching through venturing on this contingent of new stuff. The mud has not been unpleasantly offensive in the present frosty spell, but no doubt it will be so when the thaw comes.

At the meeting of the Metropolitan Board of Works yesterday week it was agreed immediately to take steps for covering in the Ranelagh, over which the Victoria-embankment extension passes, and for laying it open over at Pimlico-pier. Several other improvements were resolved upon, including the widening of the Strand, Westminster, and ordered it to be inquired whether the removal of the obstructive buildings in the Strand-lane, planted with Horseferry-road, Peter-street, and Victoria-street, are abolished, and the land, when purchased, be appropriated for the purpose of a new Kings-road, whole line of thoroughfare would be completed from Hyde-park-corner to the Bank. Peter-street, the corner of Rose-street to Long-acre, is abolished, and the street called Garrick-street, the appointment of a committee to consider and inform the Board thereon, with a reference on condition of the new name being confined to the limits stated.

The loss of 1952 children—951 boys and 1001 girls—were registered in London last week. In the ten corresponding weeks of the years 1844-54 the average number registered was 1797. The deaths of children under one year not so high in the week that ended last Saturday as it had been in any of the previous 10 weeks. The Registrar-General, in his quarterly report of deaths for the fifteen week of the years, 1854-54, in with a correction for increase of population. Scarlatina and typhus were the most fatal diseases. There was no epidemic disorder; the former having caused 85, the latter 76 deaths. Deaths from measles declined to 37. Fifty deaths occurred by whooping cough, 22 from croup, and 8 from smallpox. In the last three weeks the deaths from bronchitis were unusually great, 241, 280, and 276. The deaths in seven were 126, 97, and 123. A widow died at the age of ninety-nine years.

A fatal accident occurred on the railway work in the Blackheath tunnel of the North Kent Railway. An express-train, unwarned, dashed into a ballast-waggon, and went into collision. The engine-driver and stoker had come to a standstill. Several carriages were broken to pieces, and six persons were injured, several severely. Mr. Braithwaite, the engineer of the sufferers was opened on Monday. Several witnesses were called in reference to the movements of the express-train. The jury were unanimous that the train of ballast-waggons came to a stop in the tunnel, that the ground got down to enough to allow of the train, and that the driver of the place before any portion of the train started again. The accident seems to be accountable to the carelessness of the driver of the train, who walked clear from Blackheath when, in fact, the ballast-train was in the tunnel. The inquest was adjourned.—On Monday night a fire took place on the Greenwich line. The scene of the accident was the junction where the Greenwich line diverges from the London and Croydon. It was by which spot, shortly before eight o'clock, an engine was on the up-line preparing to run on the main line of the South Eastern, when the evening train from Greenwich came up, and a collision was the consequence. The driver and stoker of the unfortunate engine were much injured, and from twenty to twenty-five passengers sustained injuries.

Over 3000 models of vessels and other objects pertaining to naval architecture have recently been added to the museum at Haye to the large western gallery, South Kensington Museum. This gallery, 200 feet in length, is entirely occupied by the models, and the interior is arranged with much taste, who will find everything arranged in chronological order, so as to illustrate effectively the rise and progress of naval architecture in this country. The various orders of vessels have their several cases, and important improvements which, from time to time, have marked our progress in the art. Not only represented by models of vessels as they appeared when afloat, but also the buildings proper to each class of vessel, with the various implements and tools in detail are classified with care and displayed in separate groups. The stores and the shipbuilding yard are represented in the same manner by models. Some of the models of an early date are, in their way, wonderful specimens of skill and ingenuity, and, as far as we have seen, are in the most recent specimens, almost as perfect as the vessels which they represent. The collection was formed by Mr. David Lyon, in order to render the exhibition complete in its illustrations of the progress of naval architecture, who will find everything arranged in chronological order, so as to illustrate effectively the rise and progress of naval architecture in this country. LAW AND POLICE.—Matthews the cabman, who was so important a witness in the case of Muller, was yesterday week adjudicated a bankrupt, and the £500, which he received as a reward for detection of murderer, will therefore, in all probability, be vested in the assignees.

Vice-Chancellor Wood delivered, on Saturday, a question has been before him for some time respecting the validity of Cunningham's patent for raising the sunken vessels, the value of which is very great. The plaintiff has invested in a plan for lowering the yard to such a way that the rail would ground is on a sloping. The earliest trial of the matter was had by Mr. Bidder, who is boasting the yard, and this can be done from the deck. The defendant (a Mr. Cutler) argued that the plaintiff's patent was not new, and that the plan was substantially the same as that which he himself had used in raising the Royal George. The Rev. John Owen, of Church-street, Bethnal-green, has been committed to Newgate, sentenced to seven days' imprisonment by the Lambeth magistrates, for stealing sundry articles of wearing apparel from the house of the previous night. It was stated by a police inspector that three gentlemen, whom had taken to the station, had left.

The manager and the secretary of the Unity Bank were again brought up before the Lord Mayor last Saturday, when the case of the former was further heard. Mr. Bodkin, the counsel for the prosecution, said that he had been under examination a few days ago, again appeared, and underwent a long cross-examination at the hands of the gentleman who had conducted that of his brother directors with the bank. His evidence occupied the whole of the day. At the close the case was again adjourned, and the prisoners were admitted to bail, as before.

The sad case of the Snowdrop, of Newcastle, who are in custody on a charge of having scuttled that vessel in the Baltic, were again brought before the Lord Mayor yesterday week. Statements were made by two of the seamen on behalf of both of them, but the Lord Mayor committed them for trial, refusing bail.

Two men were brought before the magistrates at Stratford charged with getting under on board a ship with the intention of proceeding to sea, and on a steam-tug, and were fined, as this was the first time the law was enforced, the men were, with an intimation that in future the penalty would be severe.

A number of disorderly boys were, on Monday, mulcted in various penalties by the magistrates for snowballing in the public thoroughfares.

The case against Mr. Thomas Reynolds, the secretary of the Anti-Tobacco Society, was heard at the Westminster Police Court on Monday. Mr. Jaros had been threatened with proceedings for smoking at the future station of the South-Western Railway. He was told that the proceedings would be taken at the instance of the Anti-Tobacco Society, and he wrote to the defendant on the subject. In reply he received a letter, which informed him that if he chose to pay the fine—9s.—to the man who made the charge against him no proceedings would be taken. Instead of doing so, he wrote a summons against Mr. Reynolds for assault and other matters. The magistrate held that, if the offence was not legally proved, as many as might have demanded, while in this case the payment was only suggested. He, however, strongly reprehended the steps taken by the society.

A pension of £200 per annum has been bestowed upon Captain Magee, R.N., on account of the severe wounds which he received while serving on the Naval Brigade, during the late war in New Zealand, at Waiomu, Burt, in New Zealand. Captain Magee is a son of Sir Richard Magee, the Archbishop of Dublin's chancellor.

Under the title "Graves and Epitaphs of our Fallen Heroes in the Crimea and Scutari," a serial publication has been commenced which will be of some interest to the friends of those who have died in the seat of war. The first number contains the Hon. J. Colborne, of the 60th Rifles, and Major Lockwood, of the 55th Regiment, with particulars of the time and place of interment, with exact copies of the funeral inscriptions.

The new iron screw-ship Achilles, of 6070 tons burden and 1250-horse power, carrying twenty gunt of large calibre, made the official trial of her speed on the measured mile at the Nore on Friday. With full steam power she realised upon six runs a mean speed of 13·410. In the half-hour trials the mean speed of the Achilles was 13·71, in which, as the wind was also made, but the ship did not complete the circle on either tack in less than ten minutes.

We learn from the Sydney Morning Herald that a double attraction drew nearly 10,000 persons to the Outer Domain on the 24th of September, the presentation of new colours to the 40th, and a Victoria Cross—the latter the first occurrence of the kind in New South Wales. The distinction was conferred upon Lieutenant the Commander Burnett, R.N., "in the sense of her Majesty's ship Harrier, for behaving cool, in defiance of a heavy fire from the enemy's batteries on the Peiho river, on the occasion of the storming of a pah in April last. After the presentation the people hoisted Lieutenant Burnett on their shoulders, and carried him round the ground, the principal streets in triumph.

The Admiralty have the long narrow strip of high land running due east between Guildford and Farnham, and known as the Hog's Back, for the purpose of forming a rifle-range for the Royal Marines. Such fields-way one of the most remarkable in which the Aldershott division has been exercised, and the ground is now occupied by a considerable force, which was about seven miles from the camp, but for the selection of the position and the subsequent arrangements the Duke was present. The service ammunition for the commanding officers. It is understood that the winter field-days which will be carried on by the troops encamped at Aldershott will include the adoption of some manœuvring at this time of year, as being of more practical benefit than the ordinary field-days of summer, which are generally not made so severe as they sometimes may be considered to be in the summer months. The Duke of Cambridge appears to have taken a great interest in Royal Highness the Field Marshal Commanding-in-Chief, and seems also well pleased with the progress in view—that of protecting the troops in foul and other necessary movements.

The half-yearly inspection of the cadets at the Royal Military College, Sandhurst, by Major-General Sir Frederick Smith, Inspector of Engineers stationed there, under the command of Colonel Lucy, was made on Tuesday week by Major-General Sir Harry Jones, accompanied by the Commissioners. The Duke addressed the cadets for about twenty minutes, congratulating them on the progress they had made in every branch of their profession. The cadets were then formed in line, with the detachment of Engineers and Sappers and Miners, and went through the usual field-exercises on their left. His Royal Highness intimately inspected the line, and the cadets marched past in review order, and then went to the Royal Military Chapel. They performed the manual and platoon exercise under the command of Colonel Lucy, and subsequently went through the sword exercise. Subsequently Several luncheons followed, under the command of R. U. O. Dyson, Esq., the Duke of Cambridge, Major-General Sir Harry Jones, Commissioners, and the Duke expressed the highest satisfaction at the appearance and proficiency of the cadets. The Duke and the Commissioners afterwards proceeded to the Staff College, which he inspected in every department, and then left for Windsor. The inspection will be held college commenced on the following day.

THE COUNTZER MOVEMENT.

Last Saturday the annual presentation of prizes to the 20th Middlesex (Hackney) took place at Myddelton Hall, Islington, by Colonel Smith, who, after the distribution of prizes, addressed the corps. In the course of his observations, at the close of which he stated that he was well satisfied with the progress which the corps had made in the course of the year, and that it was a military body as he should wish to see anywhere. Among the passages of most interest to the corps was the announcement that, with their present status, as the best shot in the battalion, being awarded to Colour-Sergeant Wilson, and the second best to Sergeant-Major Lawrence, and the next two others among the bodies being awarded respectively to Colonel Easton, the Colonel of the Inniskilling Dragoons. The prizes for good attendance at the drills were awarded to Sergeant Wilson, Corporal Lewis, and Drummer Pullen, the best attendant in the battalion, having 180 attendances out of a possible 200. Sergeant Bowyer, Corporal Lewis, and Corporal Hardy, who came next in point of merit, having each 152 attendances. The prize for the best shot in the battalion, which was last year before received a cup in the name of his company (the fifth), which remains in his possession, was awarded to Private Thomas Frederick Pemberton, in the name of the regiment, a handsome photographic album, containing the likenesses of the officers and non-commissioned officers. It is possible to obtain.

The exertions competed for during the past year by the 20th Middlesex (Countzer London Rifle Rangers) were presented on Thursday week at the Crystal Palace, Sydenham, by Major-General Sir Frederick Smith, the Adjutant-General of her Majesty's Forces, in the presence of a large assemblage of spectators, consisting of the friends of the Rifle Rangers, Rifles-square. The prizes, fifty-two in number, were tastefully arranged. A number of the prizes were of the value of twenty guineas. The first prize was won by Lieutenant Beaumont. A gold albert chain, presented by Lord Raglan, was won by Sergeant Bell. The Duke of Cambridge, on behalf of the inhabitants of the Holborn district," was carried off by Private Wilson, the Duke of Cambridge's prize by Sergeant Bell, the Duke of Cambridge's Sergeant Bell and Private Hall, Lieutenant-Colonel Somerset's prize, consisting of a silver cup, by Sergeant-Major Bell. The Duke of Cambridge's Sergeant and Corporal Sharman. Colonel M'Murdo was present.

The 1st Surrey—one of the first embodied corps in the country—assembled on Monday last to enrol new members. Recruits from the site being required for the London, Chatham, and Dover Railway. The corps, which is under the command of Colonel Sir Joseph Paxton, M.P., has grown, where it is proposed to erect a building and lay out a drill-ground. The first piece of land was purchased by the late Duke of Norfolk, and was in the occupancy of a numerous company. Colonel M'Murdo pointed out the use and advantage of the volunteer movement, and the necessity of maintaining it, congratulated the 1st Surrey upon having the foundation-stone of such a building laid by Colonel Sir Joseph Paxton, and concluded by calling upon Colonel M'Murdo, which were responded to with the utmost enthusiasm, closed the proceedings.

A match took place on Thursday week, at East Sheen range, between the members of the 1st Surrey rifle corps and those of the 2nd Surrey (Richmond), ten men a side. The shooting was pretty good until it arrived at the 600 yards range, when the Richmond men fell off in the total aggregate of sixty-six marks. Aggregate scores:—1st Surrey, 331; 1st Surrey, 265.

A match between the 1st Surrey (Brighton) and the 2nd Surrey (Richmond) ten men a side, at Epsom Common, on Saturday last, resulted in favour of the Brighton men, by 17 points. The shooting was pretty good until it arrived at the 600 yards range, when the Richmond men fell off in the total aggregate of sixty-six marks. Aggregate scores:—1st Surrey, 331; 1st Surrey, 265.

Mr. Young, engineer of the lighthouse steamer Pharos, has received the appointment of Superintendent of Northern Lights, vacated by the resignation of Mr. Reed.

CHURCH AND UNIVERSITIES.

On Sunday morning the Bishop of London held a general ordination in her Majesty's Chapel Royal, Whitehall, of which his Lordship is Dean.

The Bishop of Carlisle has appointed Mr. G. G. Mounsey, for many years Deputy Registrar of the diocese of Carlisle, to be Registrar in that, in the place of the Rev. J. Milner, deceased.

The Rev. E. Hillyard, Chaplain of Norwich Workhouse, charged with identifying himself with Brother Ignatius and neglecting his duty, has been suspended by the Bishop of Norwich.

The Bishop of London has conferred the Honorary Canonry in St. Paul's Cathedral, vacant by the promotion of the Rev. Bernard Harris, B.D., to a prebendal stall in Westminster Abbey, upon the Rev. G. F. W. Gardiner, D.D., Head Master of the College of London School.

The Bishop of London has appointed as his Chaplain, in the room of the Very Rev. Dr. Stanley, Dean of Westminster, who has resigned, the Rev. Charles Thos. Sandford, Chaplain of Christ Church, Oxford, Rector, and Whitehall preacher in 1865. Mr. Sandford will set fill Dr. Sta.ley's place, however, as examining Chaplain, which appointment he has long enjoyed.

The Society for the Propagation of the Gospel held its usual monthly meeting at 79, Pall-mall, yesterday week—the Archbishop of Canterbury in the chair—when the Rev. Ernest Hawkins, the newly-appointed Canon of Westminster, announced his intention to retire from the secretaryship, which he has held for twenty-six years.

Tuesday night the third and final performance this season of the "Promenade" by the students of Worcester School took place in the presence of a numerous audience. The student action was highly creditable to their improved acquirements, and they elicited the loud and frequent applause of the visitors.

The Bishop of Lichfield, on Tuesday addressed a meeting of the Islington Church Extension Society, and stated that the progress made by the society in the erection of new churches in the metropolis, was most encouraging. The Bishop stated that in the last year, which was now closed, they had received in actual money £39,000, while they had promises to the extent of £71,000 more.

Tuesday being speech day at Merchant Taylors', the schoolroom, in Lawrence Pountney-lane, was crowded with company, and the recital and the friends of the 200 boys, who were so soon to be dismissed for the Christmas holidays. The Lord Mayor, the Rev. Dr. Raven, presided over the intellectual revels, and the master of the worshipful company and several of its members were present. The Rev. Dr. Raven read the Christmas recitation at Merchant Taylors' carried over the whole range of ancient and modern classical literature. The Rev. Mr. Bellamy, the head master, the Rev. the Provost of Dedorgres, and the qualifying English of Sheridan, all had their place in Tuesday's proceedings. The Lord Mayor, in addressing the young gentlemen, or, as Dr. Raven facetiously calls them, "the boys," to whom had been awarded the prizes, spoke of the advantages that the system of education at Merchant Taylors' afforded to their future success in life.

The arguments in the case of Bishop Colenso were brought to a close on Monday. Dr. Lushington, who had been appointed on behalf of the Bishop of Cape Town yesterday week, and Sir Hugh Cairns followed on the same side. The case will be argued by the counsel on Wednesday next—three—Had the Bishop of Cape Town jurisdiction to try the Bishop of Natal? and had the Crown jurisdiction to hear an appeal? and had the Crown original jurisdiction in the matter, unlawful or otherwise? On Monday the Right Hon. Sir Fitzroy Kelly, on behalf of Bishop Colenso, contending that if there was an appeal to the Crown at all it could only arise after a judgment had been given by the Bishop of Cape Town on the votes the appeal to the first instance by. Mr. W. M. James then replied on the same side. The Lord Chancellor announced that his Lordships desired to consider their decision, and that notice would be given to all parties when they were prepared to pronounce judgment.

WILLS AND BEQUESTS.

The will of Robert Bunnington, Cecil Fane, Esq., a Commissioner of the Court of Bankruptcy, of Bedford-square, was proved by his widow, Harriette Anne Fane, only daughter of Admiral Sir Henry Blackwood, Bart., the sole executrix named in the will. The testator died on the 22nd ult., and the whole of his property absolutely. The personalty was sworn under £40,000. The will is dated the 1st of May, 1852, and executed on a printed form. The learned Commissioner died on the 4th of October, at the age of 2.5 years.

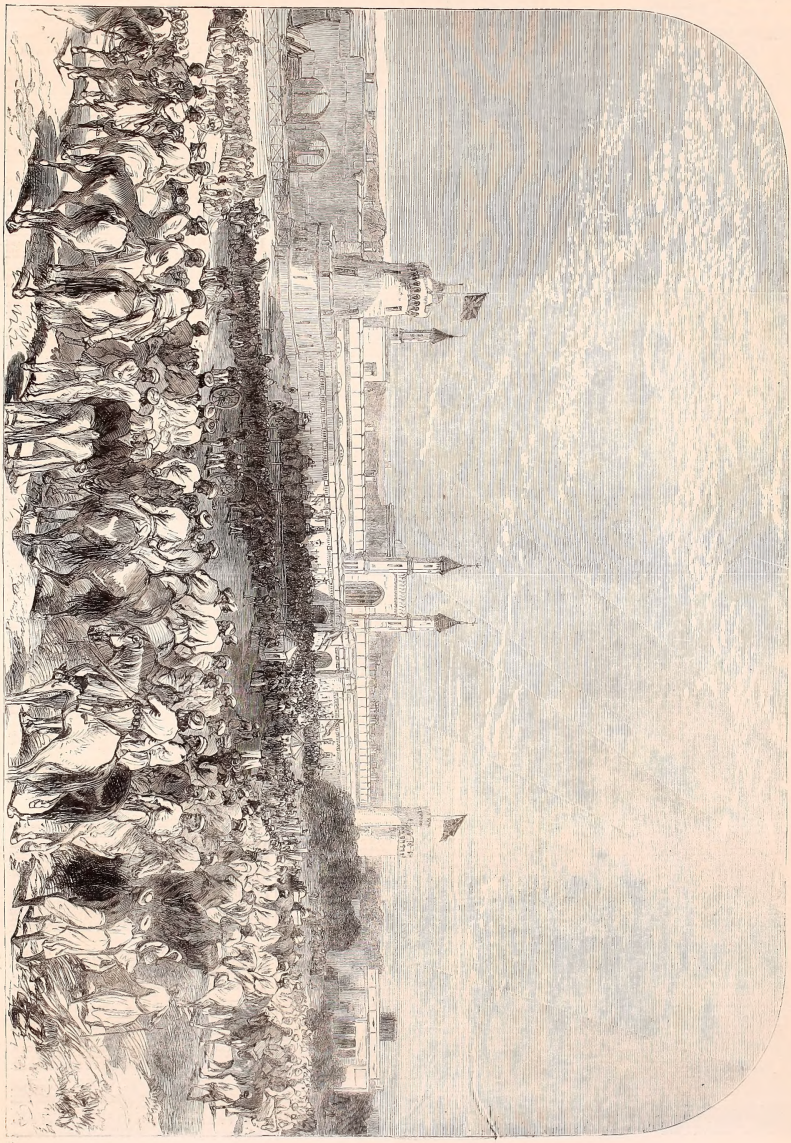
The will of Dame Elizabeth Lindsay, late of Lindsay-house, in the parish of Acton Lewis, the wife executrix, and the personalty is sworn under £9000. He has left the whole of his property, both real and personal, to his wife for her absolutely. The will bears date March 19, 1850.

The will of Hudson Gurney, Esq., of Keswick, Norfolk, and St. James's, Westminster, is sworn under £1,100,000 personalty in England. The executors are John Henry Gurney, Daniel Gurney, of North Runcton, both of the county of Norfolk, and Joseph Bevan Braithwaite. The attesting witnesses are Frederick Jansen, solicitor, Bedinghall-street, and George Cox, clerk to Messrs. Gurney and Co. The will is dated the 20th of June, 1850, and there are six codicils, the last dated the 30th of October, 1854, and the testator died on the 17th of November. The testator bequeaths to his principal legatee to John Henry Gurney (the testator's second cousin, and eldest son of John Gurney, late Member for Lynn), Henry Gurney. To him he has devised the mansion and freehold of Keswick, and all other his real estate, and has left to him the whole of his personal estate, subject to the annuities as hereinafter, bequeathing £2000 for the erection of a room suitable to contain the bells recently purchased by the testator for him at the cost of £2000, to be invested and settled in the same manner with the inheritance of the freehold, appointing his brother Daniel Gurney, of Runcton, executor, and the testator further directs that the sum of £10,000 shall also be invested for the purpose of the trust, and that the interest thereof shall be applied to the subsidy of the late John Gurney, of Earlham (who was the son of testator's late cousin, John Gurney, Member for Lynn), and his two cousins and executor, Daniel Gurney, he letting £2000 to each of his children, and £1000 to each of his grandchildren, and £2000 to Augustus Alexander, the legatee in W. H. Gurlington, of Bartlett's Buildings, Holborn, and £1000 to Mrs. Gurney, of Norwich Bank, and legacies to and to Hudson Gurney, of Keswick, and Mrs. Gurney, of Keswick, to testator subscribes to the donations, and £10 for each year they have been in his service. The legacies are—£1000 to the Old People's Home, Norwich, £1000 to Norfolk and Norwich Hospital, £1000 Quaker's Monthly Meeting, £1000 to Norwich Dispensary, £1000 to Norwich Public Library, £1000 Norwich Library Institution, £500. He has leave absolutely to the discretion of his executors to the proving so each minor allowances as he has been in the habit of making, and as they fill in the discretion of his executors to the poor of Keswick and elsewhere where he has property. All charitable bequests, legacies, and annuities are free of legacy duty, and are to be paid free of legacy duty.

The will of the Hon. Baunald Mayer FitzRoy, of Upper Grosvenor-street, the widow of the late Right Hon. Henry FitzRoy and daughter of the late Baron Rivers, Buckingham, has been proved in the Principal Court of Probate. It was made on the 21st of November last, and after making various bequests to her relatives, servants, executors and friends, the will directs £400 to be applied by the executors, through the National Association for the Promotion of Lifeboats, for the use of the Arthur Frederick, after her late son; also £400 to be given to the poor of the parishes of St. George's, Hanover-square, and Westminster, St. Margaret's, East, and St. Margaret, Westminster. There are also legacies and other bequests to the servants, executors, and friends of the testatrix's daughter, Caroline Blanche Elizabeth, the wife of Sir Coutts Lindsay, Bart., who inherits the whole of the large property, and is appointed executrix. Sir Coutts Lindsay and Sir Edmund Burton, by whom the will was proved.

The will of the late Duchess of the Marquis of Abercorn, Albany, has been proved in London by Lieutenants Frederick Lorin and Alfred Lorin, and Mr. Agrell Lorin, three of the sons of the testatrix. The will is dated Dec. 5, 1847, and, after making certain specific legacies of £100 for the immediate use of his widow and nine children, and a specific provision for his widow and two youngest sons, the testator gives a further legacy of £2000 to each of his children by the testatrix, namely, Lords James, Alfred, Frederick, and Mr. Agrell Lorin; his residuals to his widow and daughter for life; and remainder to her executors for the personalty, and to her children for that of his real estate to his and their sons. The personalty was sworn under £25,000.

AN INDIAN HARLEQUIN.



THE Indian harlequin or bush digger plays an important part in most of the public festivals in India. Like his brother buffoon in Europe, he jests and plays, and sings, and dances, but fail to excite the merriment of the vulgar. He does not, however, confine himself to merely verbal wit, his practical jokes are often of a very rude and boisterous nature. Indeed, he seems sometimes to think that his assumed character of a wild beast invests him with a right to exercise the ferocious cruelty of the tiger; for, under the excitement of an Indian drug called "bang," he will fall upon a sheep or kid and kill it with his teeth. Occasionally he breaks from his keeper and rushes upon the spectators, creating the greatest alarm and confusion, for it is known that he will not scruple, when under the influence of the occasion, to eat his teeth freely. His keeper leads him by a stout cord fastened to his waist, his body is painted so as to represent the stripes of a tiger, and he has coverings of the skin of that animal upon his hands, with sometimes claws attached to his fingers-ends, which he uses whenever in the mood for mischief. A pair of bells and two bladders complete the grotesque disguise.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON: SATURDAY, DECEMBER 24, 1864.

DIVIDED into thirty-nine articles, the Message of the newly re-elected President of the Federal States is presented for our consideration this Christmas. The document does not contain much which will interest the English reader; but there are numerous details, which, though unexciting to us, are obviously of local importance, and will probably be the text for many rough sermons in the districts to which they refer. The first mention of this country is of a complimentary kind, and recognises the good will and support which the Government of Great Britain has given to the Federal cause in the matter of telegraph by way of Behring's Strait and Asiatic Russia. There is also a hopeful reference to the revival of the scheme for the Atlantic telegraph. The two great nations, having once spoken to each other across the sea, seem bound in honour not to be silenced, and we may expect that this Christmas pealings may be flashed and returned by the marvellous wire. The next allusion to ourselves is of a graver kind. Both nations disarmed upon the Lakes; but the American Government alleges that the assaults and depredations committed in the region adjacent to the Canadian frontier by the refugee Confederates who are harboured there make it necessary to increase the Federal armament upon those waters; and England is to receive the six months' notice necessary before that can be effected. The President, however, does us the justice to disavow any idea that the Colonial Government is privy to these acts of violence. We are not otherwise alluded to, except in the general mention that most of the European States manifest a liberal disposition towards the American policy of inviting immigrants, in regard to whom Mr. Lincoln is desirous that it should be fully manifest that if he neglects needs, nor designs to impose, involuntary military service.

We may say, but in no disrespectful way, that the greater part of the Message is an exemplification of that "cracking-up" which our Transatlantic brethren like. On the same kind of thing here at times, but it is a mild and modest way. Everybody likes to be praised, and those who succeed most in life are usually found to be those who have always a good word for everybody. The Message, as regards the Federals, is all good words. Its finances are successful: the war is not, though long, is not repressive, and the citizens owe it "to themselves:" and in connection with it is to be formed a system for creating funded property to be exempt from taxation and from seizure for debts. The national banks work admirably. The issues of 671 companies, carrying 4610 guns, National growth and improvement have scarcely been checked by the war; a new State—that of Nevada—has been added to the Union, and the territories are rapidly prospering. The Atlantic and Pacific States are to be joined by railroad and telegraphs; the mines have produced at least a million of dollars; agriculture is advancing, and citizens in Arkansas and Louisiana have organised loyal State Governments. The President adds, exultingly, that Maryland is secure to liberty and the Union for ever, and to the spirited Confederate town, which has become a Southern national song, may cease—

> She wakes, she stirs, she is not dumb.
> Hurrah! she spurns the Northern scum;
> She breathes, she burns, she'll come, she'll come,
> Maryland, my Maryland!

The recital of American endurance and achievement must be admitted by the most unfavourable critic to contain much which challenges the admiration of the world. Nowhere better than in England it understood the selfsame which a true statesman reposes in the "elasticity" of a great people, and that quality is narrowly manifested in the Federal States. Si sic omnia. But the rest of the Message is bellicose in the extreme. Mr. Lincoln, like Cæsus, breathes nothing but flames. He refers proudly to the popular election which placed him once more at the head of the nation, with a decree-say, and the proclaims his resolve to execute the vengeance of the North. There can be no use in negotiation. The "insurgent leader" has no views of peace. He must be "beaten." The rebels can have peace at any moment by laying down their arms and submitting, as many have done, and the door is still open to all. Even the excepted classes know that they may count upon special mercy. But the time may come, and probably will, when that door must be closed, and more rigorous measures be adopted. Mr. Lincoln retracts nothing that he has said as to slavery; he will never retract or modify the emancipation proclamation; he will never return to slavery anyone who has been freed thereby, or by any act of Congress; and if the people should ever wish such re-enslavement, they must find some other person than himself to carry it out.

So, as we come to our Christmas altars and hearths, our brethren again raise the shout of war; and their grand topic of the day is the fierce rush of Sherman through towns which he leaves in flames; the grand hope of the day that he will force his way to the sea and will descend in thunder upon one of the great cities of the South. May we have a far different record for our next Christmas Number! "Give peace in our time" will not be the least earnest of the Christmas prayers in England.

THE COURT.

The Queen, accompanied by Princess Helena, Princess Louise, Princess Beatrice, Prince Leopold, and Countess Blucher, left Windsor Castle at a quarter to eleven o'clock on Saturday last, en route for Osborne. The suite in attendance consisted of the Countess Dowager of Mount-Edgcumbe, Lady Caroline Barrington, the Hon. Mrs. Bruce, the Hon. Florence Seymour, Lieutenant-General the Hon. C. Grey, Major-General the Hon. A. N. Hood, Lieutenant-Colonel Du Plat, and Mr. Bull. The Queen drove to the Windsor terminus of the Great Western Railway, and was received by Mr. Grierson, the general manager, and some of the directors of the Great Western Railway. Her Majesty graciously bowed to the numerous spectators assembled upon the platform. The Queen travelled by a special train with two state saloons provided by the Great South-Western Railway Company. The train, which was in charge of Mr. Grierson and Mr. Rathbone, left Windsor at five minutes to eleven, and proceeded to Slough and Reading, to Basingstoke, which was reached at three minutes past twelve. At Basingstoke the train was transferred to the care of Mr. Gedson, the traffic superintendent of the South-Western Railway, and the route continued, via Winchester and Bishopstoke, to Gosport, arriving at ten minutes past one. The Queen was received by the Royal Clarence yard by Admiral Sir M. Seymour, K.C.B., Major-General Lord Vivian, C.B., and the Hon. and Rev. Sidney Spencer. Lord Alfred Paget, M.P., Her Majesty embarked immediately on the new paddle-wheel yacht Alberta, Captain the Prince of Leiningen. The yacht steamed out of the harbour and crossed the Solent to Osborne, where the Queen arrived at two o'clock. The journey was conducted with the utmost privacy, no salutes were fired, and the troops in the garrison were dressed. At the various stations along the route her Majesty was received with marks of profound although silent respect. The Queen appeared in excellent health. The Court is expected to continue at Osborne about eight weeks.

On Sunday the Queen, Princess Helena, and Prince Leopold attended Divine service, performed at Osborne by the Rev. G. Prothero.

The Queen, with the Royal family, has taken exercise in the grounds in the vicinity of Osborne when the weather permitted.

Sir Charles Phipps, keeper of the Privy Purse, Mr. Knight, secretary of the Royal Academy, had the honour of an interview with the Queen yesterday week, at Windsor Castle.

Major-General the Hon. A. N. Hood has succeeded Major-General F. H. Seymour as Equerry in Waiting.

THE PRINCE AND PRINCESS OF WALES.

The Prince and Princess of Wales will continue at Sandringham House. Yesterday week the Prince and Princess, attended by the Marchioness of Carmarthen, Lady Harriett Phipps, and Captain Grey, drove to Swettenham Hall, the residence of Captain Lonsdale. The Prince joined the "meet" of the West Norfolk hounds at Swettenham. The Princess was present at the throwing off of the hounds. There was a brilliant muster of between three and four hundred horsemen and a large number of carriages filled with ladies. The Princess returned to Sandringham after the field had left Cam Hill.

On Sunday the Prince and Princess attended Divine service at Sandringham Church.

His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, as Colonel-in-Chief of the Royal Artillery, visited the Royal Military Academy at Woolwich on Friday last on the occasion of the half-yearly examination of the cadets.

His Excellency the Netherlands Minister has returned to town from visiting the Marquis and Marchioness of Salisbury at Hatfield House.

The Duchess of Hamilton and Lady Mary Hamilton have arrived in Paris from their chateau at Nice. The Duke of Hamilton has also arrived from Cannes, and joined his mother in Paris.

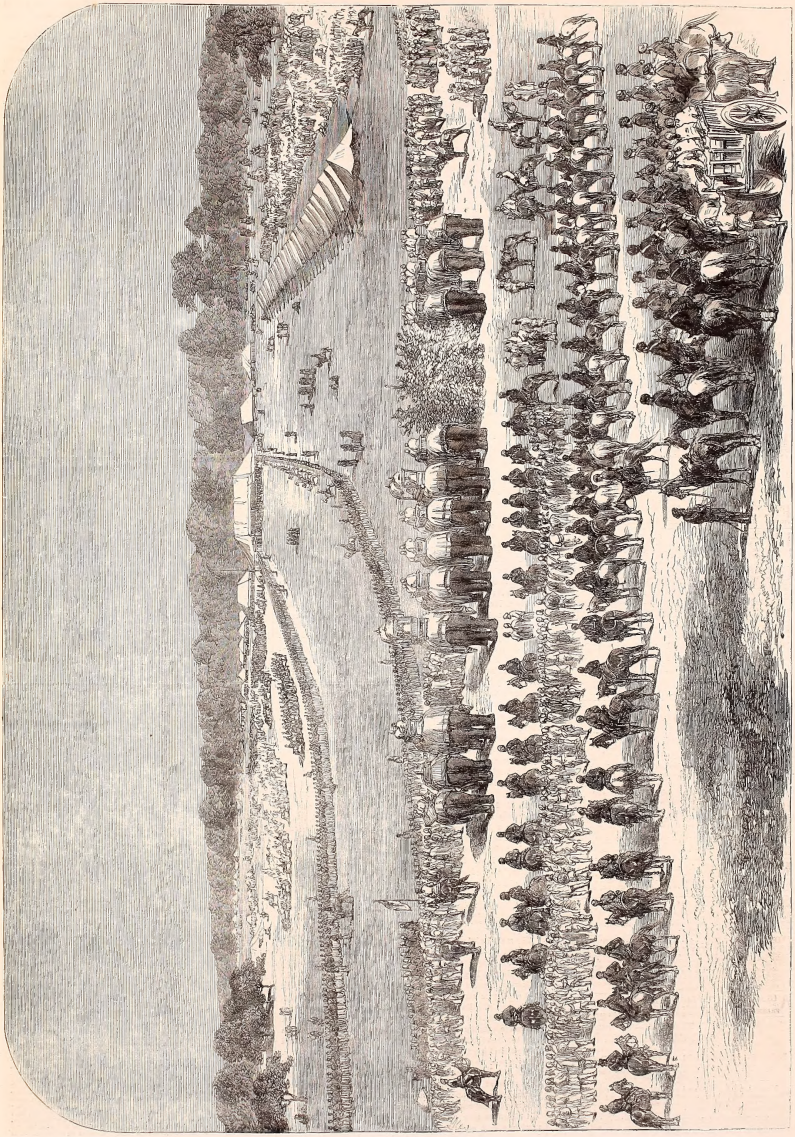
The Duke and Duchess of Grafton have left town to pass some months at Cannes.

The Duke of Northumberland completed his seventy-second year on Thursday week. The noble Duke, with the Duchess, is at Alnwick Castle, in excellent health.

Earl and Countess Spencer left Brighton on Monday for Althorp Park, Northamptonshire.

The Earl and Countess of Cork and Emily left their residence in Grafton-street on Saturday last for Marston Hall, Somersetshire.

The Earl and Countess of Scarbrook have left Thomas's Hotel, Berkeley-square, for the Continent.



The Earl of Coventry has left Thomas's Hotel, Berkeley-square, for Paris.

Viscountess Jocelyn and the Hon. Alice Jocelyn have arrived at Brocklands on a visit to Viscount and Viscountess Jocelyn.

Lady Constance Grosvenor has arrived in town from Calveley Park, Cheshire.

THE EMPEROR OF MEXICO.—The subjoined letter has been addressed by the Empress Maximilian to his Minister of State on his return to the capital:—"My dear M. Lares,—Before I leave you I wish to express my gratitude to you and to the gentlemen who have accompanied me in the departments of the interior, during which I received in each town, and almost in each village, the most touching proofs of attachment and enthusiasm, I have been able to ascertain two incontestable truths. The first shows that the empire is firmly rooted in the affections of the great and immense majority of the nation, and that upon that fact reposes the form of a Government which is in accordance with the wishes and the best interests and requirements of the populations. The second is that this immense majority desires peace, tranquillity, and order, and that it is ready to support the efforts with energetics from my Government, and which I myself am resolved to give to it. Before the end of the present month I shall have finally visited the towns are being organised with zeal and alacrity. To restore peace in this vast and magnificent country, and to secure to it prosperity by progressive means, my Government is determined to employ all its efforts and all its energies. To give it time to accomplish this great work, and to enable the nation to grow them time and opportunity to learn the national wealth, and to secure it to its beneficial under the guarantee of order and consolidating them, for their right is no longer a political question, but a question of prosperity and existence. My duties as a sovereign oblige me to be inexorable with those who, by their criminal attempts, by their odious and unjust conspiracies, by their assassinations, by their incendiarisms, by their pillages, by their acts of brigandage, by their cowardly assassinations, by their acts of brigandage, by their cowardly assassinations, by their acts of brigandage, by their cowardly assassinations

ECHOES OF THE WEEK.

It seems but a week since we heard a Message from his Excellency Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States, read in the Senate House at Washington. But lo! a whole year has passed, and again the newspapers overflow with the interminable paragraphs of a document which from its very nature must be deeply dull and wordy. There are three noticeable features in Mr. Lincoln's voluminous Message. First, that he holds out no hope of any negotiation for peace being forthcoming by the North. He declares himself resolved—if he can—to crush out Secession and Disunion at once. Next, that, in the pressure of a currency almost inconceivably depreciated, and of a public debt which it is estimated will next July reach the sum of five hundred millions sterling, he declares the resources of the United States to be inexhaustible; and that they do not admit the slightest interference from Great Britain, by proclaiming that measures will be taken to place armed vessels on the lake and river routes to prevent the transit of the United States against raiders from Canada. American gun-boats on the St. Lawrence would be the last step, and then a war between the Messrs. Messy and the Clyde and the Southampton water may follow. The only possibly dignified answer which Great Britain could return under such circumstances would be, "Certainly. Have your guns boats; but we will likewise bring out ours, and keep the peace together." For the American war steamers to have the right, while they may choose, to ply their noses into Hamilton, Kingston, and Toronto, and, perhaps, get down as far as Montreal or Quebec would be intolerable, and would probably provoke, ere long, that collision with the Canadian people which the Government of the United States prefers to be set anxious to avoid.

Tenacity of memory may be to some a blessing to others a curse; but there is no denying its great usefulness. Reading that an accident at the accident on the North East Railway, we came on a curious remark that the rules of the Blackheath tunnel were the same with regard to fires. If it is proved that the rules were since there appeared, in a little dead and gone comic periodical, an illustration representing certain refreshment contractors in a Blackheath tunnel, which had broken down in the Blackheath tunnel, and who were sitting with their umbrellas up, half-drowned by the descending rain. Nothing more is heard of the transaction until 1863, when the daughter rose again to the dealer in curiosities, and he has the grandchild's copy of the old cut from her mother, and has paid her £50 for it. But it subsequently turns out that the arms has been sold by the father for £100. Litigation ensues. The latter case is carried up and "re-hinted" it, and returned it to the dealer, who has re-sold it to a Member of Parliament for £300. The question of the various specifications we do not find it mentioned how much the Cotton House officer gave for the hangings in the first instance—probably not three hundred shillings. They have been lent to the Museum at Nicholas Poussin, and to represent passages in the life of Moses: but when tattered, and faded, and colourless were given to the nation for more than one of our great grandmother's samplers. A great many connoisseurs were called to show how difficult it was to avoid an alleged forgery, and both of the plaintiff's evidence was disputed; but the jury seemed to think there had been a faultless in the book somewhere, and so the verdict of the Cotton House officer £300 damages. So that she has made rather a good thing out of her tapestry.

The Bishop of Peterboro would appear to be irrepressible. A Doctor Nicholls has written to the papers to repeat that the brethren desire only a fair enquiry, or practical examination, or test of power, or time, and under any polarity, to prove what they assert—that the manifestations in their presence are not due to fraud, deception, fedency, or any kind of imposture. They are prepared, they say, to meet a select committee fairly chosen, at any place, except St. Anne's Rectory, or the Honeycomb Sofa. They have spent £250 at his disposal for any charitable purpose if the verdict be against them. This is all very well so far as it goes; but the spirit rappers should have resorted to the somewhat indecorous proceeding of sending circulars round to a number of literary and other men, asking for a written opinion of "the power leave" or a "by your leave," they are nominated as members of a certain "test committee." We find our own name in one of these circulars; although we have one of the best company—Mr. Dickens, Mr. Hepworth Dixon, Mr. Lewes, Mr. Thornton Hunt, Mr. Jon Leech, and many others of note are also enumerated—we must emphatically protest against being made a "medium" for advertising purposes by the proprietors of a show. Those who provide the public amusements, and "spiritual investigations." The material exigencies of attempting to earn an honest penny are quite enough for us. The Bishop may, we dare say, very wonderful people; but we are rather tired with wonders. We have seen Simmonds eat off his own head, and Heller devour his own hat. We have listened to the pythoness, Cora Hatch. We have heard of a young man in the State of Indiana who can jump down his own throat. We are by no means prejudiced against the marvellous just now, it would be to one who could tell us how to prevent the rain falling, or who could bring the sunshine when we have occasion to a sense of common honesty with regard to the article they supply.

What is a billion? Doctors disagree. Is it a thousand millions, or a million of millions. Butick says it is two millions, or twice a million. The schoolmen of the Irish Education Commission declare that a billion is a thousand billions, and a trillion a thousand billions. Then, of course, there is a quadrillion, a quintillion, and a sextillion. Butler's "Tutor's Assistant" defines a billion as a million billions. What does Walkingame say? Is Cocker silent on the subject? and Colenso College be quoted? For our part, we hold with the million of millions definition: first, because we learnt arithmetic out of Butler, and next, because we once heard his opinion confirmed by a foreign capitalist—a Mexican Don—who was worth five millions sterling; and surely a man worth so much ought to know better than anybody else.

General Tom Thumb, Mrs. General Tom Thumb, and Mrs. General Tom Thumb's baby are the chief attraction in this now at the Crystal Palace. Commodore Nutt is the rage, and Miss Minnie Warren the cynosure of all eyes, and the dumbling of such a monstrous little fellow. Surely the reign of "les infiniment petits" must be approaching. How sings P. T. de Bérenger :—

Vous est petit, petite, petites,
Peinres, comprenez, nous autz!
Je bentes petite Bretonne,
Desolez de petite remparts.
Sur la frontière est formée
Marche, au teuil de petite tambours.
Une guerre petite commence
Mais les tardeurs regnent toujours.

The great Palace of Art and Science has now become a gaping-place for the progeny of him who three and twenty years since when poor Haydon killed himself, the Times newspaper called a "disgusting event." Now we are rumbling at such a monstrous rate in the Str. The Crystal Palace is a commercial speculation, and the directors are quite justified in the interest of their shareholders in making as much money as they can. The public taste runs small this Christmas. Vive les Nains! Long live Lilliput!

An ill-advised almost ineffectual attempt to remonstrate with her Majesty against the partial seclusion which she is still pleased to preserve has been recently made in an influential journalistic quarter. Her Majesty will come back to her loving lieges in her own good time; and the people of England can well afford to wait her leisure. Far more grateful was the procedure of the promoters of the public meeting held at the Mansion House, on the third anniversary of the Prince Consort's death, to establish a refuge for drifted children, to be called the Albert Orphan Asylum. The scheme is one of the most practical and philanthropic we have yet met with, and merits the very fullest public support.

FINE ARTS.

Mr. Horsley and Mr. Thomas Faed have been elected from the ranks of the A.R.A.s to that of full Royal Academicians. The vacancy occasioned by the death of Mr. Roberts will not at present be filled. Mr. Hart, R.A., has accepted the office of librarian to the Royal Academy, in place of Mr. H. W. Pickersgill, R.A., resigned. The Academy silver medals have been awarded to the following students:—To Mr. Thomas Jones Barker for the best painting during the year, in Mr. Cope's class; to Mr. Oakes, for the best copy made in the school of painting; to Mr. Claude Lorraine Pilbrigh, for the best drawing from the life; to Mr. Richard Lincoln Pilbrigh, for the best drawing from the antique; to Mr. James Griffiths, for the best medal from the antique; to Mr. Sydney Williams, for the best medal from academy figure; and to Mr. Hooper Henry Cauty, for the best perspective.

The vacancy among the A.R.A.s created by the Royal Academy from Mr. John Gibson, R.A., the sculptor, stating that he intends to bequeath to that body £2,000 on condition that it will be at once to perpetuate the names for the inscription of the casts of all the sculptor's works.

We have room for three notes to add to our recent biographical notices of the late David Roberts, R.A. In personal appearance Mr. Roberts was a fine, handsome, soldierly man. He was above the middle height. He stood, in fact, to Sir Edwin Landseer as the model for the farmer in "The Dialogue at Waterloo," now in the South Kensington gallery, and for the old man in "The Sanctuary," now at Windsor. He was very fond of his profession, and in the days when he was poor would have found their way to the Continent. One of his pictures was for many years purchased by Mr. Hall, the banker, and hung in the Hall, Dulwich, who, piqued, it is said, at being refused a horse by Lord Melbourne, left the picture to that nobleman in his will. The picture by Roberts, which bore the donor's name in the Louvre to King Louis Philippe. As the collection was the King's own property, it was carried off by Napoleon III. on the flight of that family, and the picture by Roberts returned to England, and was sold by Christie's for £1,000. Roberts's gentleness of character and conscientiousness was afforded in the execution of the great picture of "The Destruction of Jerusalem." Jesus which was left unfinished at his death, and which the autobiographies which have yet appeared. He had originally painted the sun setting over the distant shirts of the city beyond the valley. Mr. Richard Ford, who had called upon the fiery and lurid colour of it and the surrounding clouds for effect, suggested that the sun should be rising instead of over, finding from the plan of the city and the description of the siege that the sun could not be seen to that direction at the time. Roberts, in deference to the remonstrance of his friend, altered it, so sought by representing what was quite probable and still more striking—a sunrise through the smoke of the city. The picture was exhibited all over the kingdom. During its transmission from place to place it was much damaged, and at last was thoroughly repaired by Mr. Agnew, at a heavy cost of price, we may remark that Mr. Roberts effected one of many instances among living artists of their pictures selling enormously after the painter's death. For many years, Take, for example, the Roberts in the Bicknell Collection. We give the prices paid for the following pictures at the sale after the death of the gentleman in the dispersion last year of that gentleman's fine collection. "Ruins of Baalbec (1840), £520—£787 10s. "Interior of the Church of St. Sergius, Cairo" (1841), £415—£630 10s. "Tyre," £160—£367 10s. "Sidon," £156—£278. "Street in Antwerp," £105—£210. "Interior of St. Gudule, Brussels," £105—£210. "Interior of St. George, Lierre" (1850), £300—£1138 10s. And unenviable other equally remarkable instances could be given. Mr. Roberts formerly studied in Edinburgh, and married Miss Roberts's only daughter and child. This gentleman has also a collection of pictures by Roberts at the Manor House, Peckham gallery, which contains a series of Roberts's works. Two of this series "Baalbec" and "Philæ," are said to have been painted in one week.

Recurring to Professor Pettenkofer's new system of photo-engraving, which was mentioned last week, it may be mentioned that other agents besides alcohol operate in a similarly surprising way. For instance, muriatic acid, or the fumes of the aqua fortis used to etch, fine, petroleum, benzine, and the various attars. The specification of the patent says that, in special cases, higher and lower temperatures than the ordinary one may be employed, and the operation used is to be opened from time to time in order to watch the progress of the decomposition and to be able to determine when it has been allowed sufficient vapour.

Since writing the remarks which accompanied our recent Engraving of Mr. Orchardson's picture in the French Gallery, "The Challenge: a Puritan's Struggle between Honour and Conscience," we have been reminded that a somewhat similar subject was treated by another artist, an incident described by Sir Walter Scott in "Peveril of the Peak." The reconciliation of the Puritan and the Cavalier is the theme which the painter borrowed his conception from the novelist, notwithstanding that the characters do not quite exactly answer the two descriptions and that although "Peveril" is mentioned, or even to be an illustration of the book. The challenge, as Scott has it, is sent by the Cavalier in search of a duel, but the Puritan refuses it on conscientious and in the point of his rapier, as represented in the picture, by Peveril's friend and proposed second, Major Bridgenorth, in the Parliamentary Major Bridgenorth, at the residence of the latter. And, as also represented by the painter, the Puritan is encouraged in his decision to confer to the Cavalier's sword by the presence of his daughter, the Puritan person, Scotsman.

Some interest in the question has existed regarding the propriety of the restoration in the chromolithographic copies published by the Arundel Society of the ravages of time upon the original paintings. The question has in chromolithography, of middling and especially a modernising "prettifying" rendering, which may be far removed from the chromolithographic copy will appear to be complied in reproducing the fresco of "The Nativity," by Luini, at Saronno; which will complete the series of the Arundel Society's publications for the present year. In reproduction, with all the marks of decay, will be illustrated by the issue of a copy of Giulio Romano's fresco in the Palazzo del Te at Mantua, by Mr. Thomas Dyce. This last chromolithograph will have the advantage of being drawn and transferred to stone by one hand alone—Mr. Vincent Brooks's—and printed by another—Mr. Hanhart's. The preference of the subscribers for one or the other plan will be understood to be the determining factor in the choice of subjects. It is not more certain means of testing this preference would, however, have been to issue copies of one and the same work by the two systems.

A group, consisting of statues of the Counts D'Egmont and Horn, by Messrs. Geefs, of Brussels—will shortly be completed in reproduction of the interior and of Foreign Affairs, with the Municipal Council and several private individuals have subscribed an address appropriate to the occasion was delivered by the Burgomaster.

Tuesday's Gazette contains the promised Commission to inquire into the state of middle-class schools, having reference to any endowments that may be available for the purpose of their improvement, and the names of the Commissioners appointed are Lord Stanley, Lord Lyttelton, Sir Stafford Northcote, Mr. Baines, M.P.; and Mr. Thomas Dyke Acland.

In a letter to a clergyman, Mr. Gladstone pronounces the constitution of the present Court of Appeal in ecclesiastical causes to be unsatisfactory; and expresses the opinion that it is to the Bishops of the Church, in conjunction with the Queen's Ministers, that it principally appertains to consider in what way the constitution of that Court may be most properly amended.

The Sydney Mint has issued 2,225,000 sovereigns this year. The annual yield opportunities decline the value of the coinage of the colony for the period of 1851; but the Sydney Morning Herald states that the present year is expected to large quantities of gold received from Riverina, Victoria, and but by an increased yield of the gold-fields of New South Wales. The receipts from Cook during January, 1861, in the first nine months of 1859, and only 230,810 oz. in the first nine months of 1861.

MUSIC.

Her Majesty's Theatre has been closed during the past week in consequence of the preparations for the pantomime on Boxing Night. For a similar reason Covent Garden has been closed since Wednesday last. On Monday a new singer made her debut at the latter theatre—Mdlle. Adelaide Cornelis, from the Conservatoire, Paris, having been heard in the subordinate part of Nancy, in Flotow's "Martha." She is very young and new to the stage, but seems to be a promising singer.

The Sacred Harmonic Society gave their first Christmas performance of "The Messiah" at Exeter Hall on Friday evening last. The hall, as usual, was crowded to the doors; and the performance (directed by Mr. Costa) was in the highest degree effective. The principal solo-singers were Mdme. Parepa, Mr. Sims Reeves, and Mr. Weiss. There was also a chorus of 400 voices, which were loudly applauded, but the call was not in any case responded to. We were glad of this, as the custom of encores is a nuisance which ought to be put down at once. The second Christmas performance of Handel's sublimest work was given last night, the singers being the same as before.

The lively and delightful little opera "A Cup of Tea and Supper" has been revived at the Haymarket with great success, crowds of the playgoers and amateurs of a past generation having flocked to see it and to enjoy Strauss's delicious music. This once-famous composer seems now out of fashion nowadays, and his very name is almost forgotten. But we have seen the day when he was the idol of the public, and when "The Haunted Tower," "The Siege of Belgrade," "The Pirates," and "The Iron Duke" were the favourite airs of our pianoforte. Bands, both in London and the provinces, performed by our greatest vocalists and comedians, and received with acclamations by overflowing houses. At the Haymarket no single night can have been boisterous of the many that theatre not being a musical one. But Miss Louisa Keeley, not only was she acting Buttercup in Strauss's music, but sang the principal airs (notably the charming "With lowly suit and pleasitive duty") very sweetly. The piece was altogether well performed, Mdlle. Cole and Incledon (as Messrs. Favers, Coupon, Arthur; Miss Louisa Keeley and Miss Nelly Moore. Were our so-called English opera-houses to revive some of Strauss's pieces, and Offenbach's, and Lecocq's sparkling Gallic trifles, as due effect, we are convinced that they would find their account in doing so.

We learn that Mr. Mapleson, when he opens Her Majesty's Theatre for the Italian opera season, is about to bring before the public two performers, a tenor and a soprano, both of the Continental reputation. The soprano is Mdlle. Ilma de Murska, from Hamburg, where she has lately divided with Titiens the applause and ovations of the musical public. She is described as a beautiful woman, a great actress, and a singer of the highest powers. The tenor is M. Jonlain, who is now drawing crowds to the Théâtre Lyrique in Paris. Gardoni, in "Lucia di Lammermoor," is said to be a performance of incomparable power and pathos. The other principals, Mesdmes. Lemmens, &c., are engaged. Before beginning his London season, Mr. Mapleson is to have a provincial tour, with Mdlle. Titiens and the chief members of his company, including Signor Arditi, as part musical conductor.

The Royal Society of Female Musicians, a most useful and praiseworthy institution, had a benefit concert at the Hanover-square Rooms on Tuesday evening, December 17. It was highly successful, and deserved to be so, for, independently of its benevolent object, it were a classical and excellent performance. The principal performers were Mdlle. Leibhart, Mdlle. Enequist, Miss Ellen Hughes, Miss Banks, Miss Dolby, Mdlle. Sainton-Dolby, Mrs. Sims Reeves, Mrs. Cooper, Mr. Winn, Mr. Alban Irving, and the Orphens Glee Union. Mr. Otto Goldschmidt and M. W. G. Cusins were the pianists at the concert (Mdlle. Clara Novello was unwell and Dunbey) Bechthoven's trio in E flat, op. 70; the latter played Thalberg's fantasia on "Home, sweet Home," and they played together Schumann's theme and variations for two pianos. Ernst's "Pacquan" was performed by Herr Strauss; and Molique's fairy solo, "Lantasie ed Mandolino," was executed by Mr. John Thomas. Dr. Sternbale Bennett was the conductor, and the whole concert went off with much success.

The Musical Society of London has issued its prospectus of the ensuing session. There are to be four orchestral concerts—on March 25, May 6, June 3, and July 1, a conversazione on April 15; and two orchestral trials of new compositions on Feb. 15 and Nov. 22. The orchestra will be conducted, as hitherto, by Mr. Alfred Mellon.

THE THEATRES.

We have little to add to the account we gave last week of the preparations for the Christmas pantomimes. At the Lyceum, however, a modification of plan has taken place, in consequence of the success experienced by Mr. Fechter in his revival of "Hamlet." The piece will have been performed on the three first nights of the present week, and will also be continued after Christmas, Mr. Fechter playing the character every night until about the middle of January. The business of the week has been principally confined to benefits. Miss Marie Wilton took hers at the Lyceum on Wednesday, being her farewell to that theatre; and Mr. Edward Stirling on Thursday. Mr. Leslie Goodwin, the boy-actor of Scarborough on Monday.

"Hamlet" was performed on Monday and Tuesday, being the last appearances of Miss Faucit, Mr. Phelps, and Mr. Creswick for a season. "The Corsican Brothers" was performed on Monday, at the Haymarket, for the last time, in "The Stranger," On Tuesday, and during the week, "A Cup of Tea and Supper" has been represented. At the Queen's Theatre, on Saturday, the tragedy of "Damon and Pythias" was performed, the former character by Mr. Alfred Wigan, the latter by Mr. Walter Lacy. The latter will attend on Monday with the charm of the Idiot Witness." All, therefore, appears clear for the pantomimes. At the Surrey entertainments, Mr. Leon Pilgrim and Miss Fanny Hall will again be in the field as a candidate for public favour in the shape of a hippodrome. Mr. Batty's circus, Loudon, Paris, and Vienna, from Madrid and Lisbon, will exhibit twice a day during the festive season.

Among the curiosities at the recent Mechanics' Fair in San Francisco were:—"A tee-total ox, a three-legged colt, a three-legged dog, and the only unlimited upright piano base of the most wonderful manufactures in the State."

The Observer states that the Queen devotes the early part of every week-day to the public business of the country—reading, and examining, and signing every necessary document with the same care and punctuality that characterised her late husband.

The office of president of the Oxford University Boat Club, which has been held since 1857 by Mr. C. W. Mansfield, has been conferred on A. Morrison, Esq., of Baliol College, and Pastfon Pack, Brera, has been appointed the secretary. The former appointment is to be held for until next term. The challenge from Cambridge has been formally accepted by Oxford for the ensuing year.

Mr. Frank Buckland writes:—"I lately heard of a shepherd who possesses a dumb sheepdog; he is anxious to breed from the pup, but who possesses a dumb sheepdog; he is anxious to breed from the pup, but as he is very clever at driving sheep, he thinks he can, by the sound and of his dog, the shepherd stands still when the dog is barking, and moves when it is silent. I think there is a good deal in the theory that it is "no good to keep a dog and bark oneself."

By the last American mail a letter, which is remarkable both as a documentary curiosity and as a specimen of manufacturing skill, was received by the directors of the Atlantic Telegraph Company, in which they state that the deck is only twice the weight of a similar piece of wire, which was made by Messrs. Bolton, Paul, and Co., of Norton, Lancashire, in 1861, and says, "In the number of your paper dated March 1, 1861, 1904," and says, "In the number of your paper dated March 1, 1861, 1904," and says, "In the number of your paper dated March 1, 1861, 1904,"

THE DISTRESS IN LANCASHIRE.

A meeting of the Central Executive Committee was held on Monday in the Manchester Townhall—the Right Hon. Sir Thomas Bazley, Bart., in the chair.

Mr. Maclure, honorary secretary, reported that £273 had been received during the last three weeks, and that the balance in the bank was £744.

He also reported on the circumstances which led to a deficiency of £2,000 in the moneys intrusted to Mr. Paine, the treasurer of the Heaton relief fund. A letter was also read from the secretary of the Heaton relief fund, in which the following statement was made:—The grants made by the Central Executive and the Manchester Common Council, &c., have been regularly paid into the bank, the endowments being in many instances of annual subscriptions into the bank, the endowments being in many instances of annual subscriptions which, indeed, are paying into the bank. Mr. Paine was appointed to his own purposes. The amounts thus embezzled were not paid over to the members of the various committees. The accounts have regularly been audited to prosecute Mr. Paine, and are sitting under legal advice. At a meeting of the committee, however, and are sitting under legal advice. At a meeting of the committee, however, held on Thursday last, the committee felt it to be a work of new work, and to raise the amount deficient. And that on behalf of the distress in the township in response to the call for it made by the letter to avert any possible loss during the same time. It was resolved,—"That a meeting of the Heaton relief committee be called by the committee to be held on Monday next, to consider the funds to make up by fresh subscriptions the amount of £2,000 embezzled by the late treasurer."

Mr. E. Ashworth inquired as to the reduction in the amount of pauperism in the parishes of Lancashire during the past week arose from increased employment in the mills or from additional sum being granted by the poor-law boards.

Mr. Farnall's report upon the condition of the factory-acting unions included in his returns shows that in the factory districts embraced in the Union there was a total reduction of 4,000 in the number of persons receiving parochial relief, Ashton, Bacup, Blackburn, Burnley, Colne, Darwen, Derby, Haslingden, and Preston present the greatest improvement. The average percentage of pauperism in the population of the twenty-seven unions on the 10th inst. was 5·2; in the corresponding week of 1861 it was 9·0; and in the corresponding week of 1863 it was 6·6.

The following grants were made from the general fund, each grant extending six fortnights:—Bacup, £200; Ashton, £200; Oldham, £200; Rochdale, £200; Hyde, £200; Mossley, £100; Stalybridge and Millbrook, £100; Tintwistle, £100; Hollingworth, £100; Witton, £100; Denton and Haughton, £100; Stockport, £100; Heywood, £100; Chorley, £150; Chorlton and Ardwick, £100; Glossop and Hadfield, £100; Preston, £200; Darwen, £100; Colne, £100; Padiham, £100; Great Harwood, £50; Ancoats, £500; St. Matthew's, Chalderton, £100; Crompton, £100; Middleton and Tonge, £100; Pendleton, £100; Salford, £200; Wigan, £300; Leigh, £200; Royton, £100; Hyde, £100; Shawforth, £40.

The committee adjourned for a month.

POST-OFFICE NOTICES.

PATTERN POST TO AND FROM THE NETHERLANDS.—On and after the 1st of January next patterns of merchandise may be transmitted by post between England and the under-mentioned British colonies in the Netherlands, viz., Curaçoa, Surinam, Barbadoes, British Guiana, Carriacou, Dominica, Grenada, Honduras, Jamaica, Montserrat, Nevis, St. Kitts, St. Lucia, St. Vincent, Tobago, Trinidad, and Turks Islands, and the following British settlements on the West Coast of Africa:—Cape Coast Castle, Gold Coast, Accra, and Lagos, subject generally to the rates of postage, which must be prepaid by means of postage-stamps, chargeable on each packet of patterns, viz.:—For every 2 oz., or fraction of 2 oz., 3d.; above 4 oz. and not exceeding 4 lb., 6d.; above 4 lb. and not exceeding 8 lbs., 1s.; above 8 lb. and not exceeding 12 lb., 1s. 6d.; above 12 lb. and not exceeding 2 lb., 2s.; every additional 4 lb., 6d. Special attention is directed to the following rules and regulations, which must be strictly enforced:—1. No packet of patterns must exceed two feet in length, breadth, or depth. 2. The patterns must be free from any writing, except that which exclusive of the address of the sender, and, indeed, whatever may have a mark and its own number. 3. There must be no writing or printing other than the address of the person to whom the packet is addressed, and that of the sender, a trade mark and numbers, and the prices of the articles. 4. The patterns must be sent in covers open at the ends or sides, in accordance with the following regulations, however, of the packet of patterns to be returned, either of the foregoing rules will subject a packet of patterns to the colonial book-charged as a letter. It will not be allowed the privilege of the "Book Post" 5. Every post will apply to the pattern post with the above colonies and foreign countries, in order to prevent such packets passing through the transit mail. 6. No letter, a packet of patterns may, when it is necessary course, it would be twenty-three hours beyond the time when, in the ordinary course, it would be forwarded. N.B. The rule which forbids the transmission by post of letters or any notice of any kind likely to injure the revenue of the Post-office, applies to the packets of patterns. Any officer of the Post Office is, of course, applicable to the packets of patterns. Any packet containing anything of the kind will be charged and not sent to its destination.

PATTERN POST TO THE LEVANT.—On and after the 1st of January next patterns of merchandise of no intrinsic value may be transmitted by post between the United Kingdom and the several places in the Levant at which France maintains post-offices, under the same regulations as those which apply to the transmission by post to France and Algeria, and at the following rates of postage, viz.:—For every 2 oz., or fraction of 2 oz., 3d.; above 4 oz. and not exceeding 1 lb., 6d.; above 4 lb. and not exceeding 8 lbs., 1s.; above 8 lb. and not exceeding 12 lb., 1s. 6d.; every additional 4 oz., 3d. Such patterns must not be sent to any place in the Levant at which France has no post-office. Unless they are intended, the address of the person, a manufacturer's or trade mark, and the number of the packet, no writing or printed matter which shall contain manuscript marks other than those above mentioned can be sent in open covers, may be inclosed in sealed packets. Any other articles, whether of a letter or not, which may be sent in open covers, may be inclosed in sealed packets. The following are the places in the Levant at which France maintains post-offices:—Alexandria, Beyrout, Cavalla, Jaffa, Jerusalem, Salonica, post-offices:—Alexandria, Beirout, Smyrna, Mitylene, Dardanelles, Gallipoli, Constantinople, Rhodes, Smyrna, Scutari, Smyrna, Metylene, Dardanelles, Gallipoli, Ineboli, Kerasunde, Samsoun, Sinope, Trebizonde, Tripoli, Varna, Volo, Salonica, and Zante.

NEWSPAPERS FOR RUSSIA.—Since issuing the Notice No 38, dated the 2nd of January last, and thenceforward, letters transmitted between the United Kingdom and the Russian Empire, by the mail packets of the Prussian Lloyd Co.—posted unpaid, will be charged on delivery with an additional rate of one shilling per letter, but the ordinary postage of 4d. per half ounce will be efficiently prepaid, will also be charged the amount deficient and one shilling thereon.

The Observer contradicts the statement that the Government is considering the propriety of purchasing railways under the Act of 1844.

The American papers say that there is a New York regiment which, during the whole of the war, has traveled over 100,000 miles, has transported 13,000 miles, fought twenty general engagements, marched through fifteen States, and has been under fire 1,000 days. Its colonel is Ellsworth, Sherman, and Grant.

A hurricane burst over Lisbon on the 12th inst. Great damage was done, principally to the shipping. Several ships were sunk in the river or considerably damaged. The vessels of war in the harbour were not suffered to damage, but all the steam-vessels plying there were laid up throughout the day. In the Alcantara gardens and other exposed places large trees were blown down; and in Lisbon generally considerable damage was done.

The ship Flying Cloud, belonging to Messrs. T. M. Mackay and Co., sailed on the 13th instant from Gravesend to Queensland, Captain Jones, commander, a screw-steamer, Captain Rowden, commander, a screw-steamer. The Flying Cloud is the forty-eighth vessel that has sailed on the land-route system of emigration, under the immediate direction of the Queensland Government. She contains 427 souls, divided into paying, assisted, and free passengers, and consisting of 188 members of families, 99 single men, and 80 single females.

During the last two years the life-boats of the Royal National Life-boat Institution have been manned on all occasions by about 12,000 persons, and it is a gratifying and encouraging fact to find that, with the exception of the two men who perished at the Tynemouth life-boat on the night of the 24th ult., not a single life has been lost from a life-boat during the night of the 24th ult., not a single life has been lost from a life-boat during the night of the 24th ult., not a single life has been lost from a life-boat during the walls of the Lahore Fort. The Durbar itself was a striking spectacle. At the extreme end of the tent was the throne of the Viceroy, on a raised dais, spread with cloth of gold and covered with a crimson canopy. On each side of the throne were ranged, in the form of an ellipse, the rajahs, chiefs, and native gentlemen, about six hundred in number, all gaily attired, with the civil and military officers, whose various uniforms added to the general effect. The Viceroy opened the durbar with a speech in the Oordoo language, a translation of which has already been published. After this the presentations commenced, and, when the last sirdar had been introduced, tokens of honour were conferred on the twenty leading chiefs. During this ceremony the bagpipers of the 93rd Highlanders marched round, playing Scotch airs, much to the pleasure of the native gentlemen, who are great admirers of the Scottish national instrument.

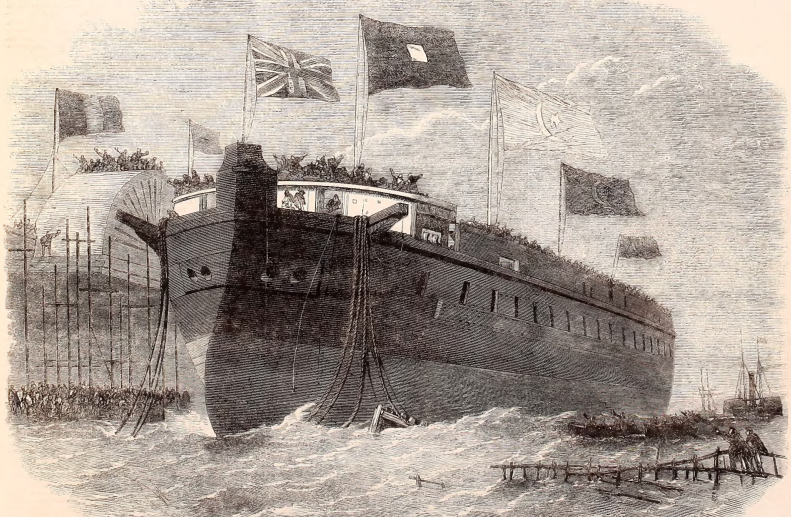
THE TURKISH IRON-CLAD FRIGATE SULTAN MAHMOUD.

THE new ship of war built for the Sultan of Turkey by the Thames Ironworks Company, and launched on Thursday, the 13th inst., from their dockyard at Blackwall, is of 4221 tons burden; its length being 253 ft. 9 in.; breadth, 55 ft. 11 in.; and depth of hold, 37 ft 6d in. Its internal construction is immensely strong. The ship is built up from a keelson formed of a huge bar of iron, about 40 in. deep. To this the iron ribs are bolted at intervals averaging 24 in. These ribs vary from 16 ft. in length and 3 ft. in depth to 4ft. in length and 18 in. deep. Crossing the longitudinal girders, they divide the lower part of the ship into a number of square cells, forming a huge honeycomb of iron all over. They form the side upon which the inner skin of iron plates is secured, and upon which again rests the timber backing, 9 in. thick, and over it the armour-plates, 5 in. thick of iron, both the timber and armour-plates resting on a ledge formed on the outer side of the ribs, and commencing about 5 ft. below the water-line. Above the lower section, or joints of the vertical ribs, there are longitudinal girders, which stretch along the whole length of the sides, and unite at the bow and stern; these intersect the ribs, and serve to give shipbuilding strength to the massive sides of the ship. The sides are held firmly towards each other by the thick and deep girders of iron, which stretch across the ship, and upon which the decks are laid. The armament will consist of eighteen 7-ton guns—nine on each side, and each carrying a 150 lb. ball; and on the upper deck there will be a 12-ton gun at the bows, with a calibre for 300-pounders. In addition to the attacking power which she will carry in her guns, the Sultan Mahmoud is also provided with a formidable means of offence in the shape of a large advanced prow, similar to that of the Valiant and Minotaur. The circular bow—in shape not unlike a swan's breast—is partly above the water-line, and projects some 8 ft. or 10 ft. beyond the natural line of the bow. It has an edge not thicker than 3 in.; but the hinder parts are much wider, and, as it is strengthened by some very heavy forgings and metal-work, it would administer a very destructive blow to any vessel that it might run into when under steam. The anticipated speed of the vessel will be about 13 knots. The engines of the Sultan Mahmoud are to be of 900-horse power, and are to be manufactured by Messrs. Salkeld and Co. The gun-deck, as well as the hull below the load-line, is protected by the iron plating along its whole length. The upper deck is also plated beneath the oak flooring. The launch was performed with great success. It was attended by M. Musurus, the Turkish Ambassador; Mr. Layard, M.P., the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs; and other persons of distinction—as briefly reported last week.



THE LATE M. MOCQUARD, PRIVATE SECRETARY TO THE EMPEROR NAPOLEON III.

THE LATE M. MOCQUARD, PRIVATE SECRETARY TO THE EMPEROR NAPOLEON III.

THE funeral obsequies of M. Mocquard took place in the Church of St. Roch at Paris on Monday week. Several of the Ministers, Senators, and other members of the Imperial Court were present. The corners of the pall were held by Marshal Vaillant, General Fleury, Baron Lacrosse, Vice-President of the Senate, and M. Dupin, Attorney-General at the Court of Cassation. The family of M. Mocquard walked after the hearse. A battalion of the Line preceded the cortège, which was followed by a detachment of cuirassiers and dragoons of the Imperial Guard. Marshal Vaillant pronounced a funeral oration over the grave, in which he praised the fidelity of M. Mocquard to the Emperor. He said that he had come to bring the last farewell of the Sovereign from whom the deceased had so lately received a last embrace. M. de la Guerronnière also made a speech, in which he paid a tribute to M. Mocquard in the name of the Senate and the press. It is announced that the literary works of M. Mocquard will shortly be collected and published in one volume. He wrote, besides "La Prise de Pekin," a comedy and other dramatic pieces. A few years ago he published a novel, called "Jessie," which had a certain degree of success. He was a lively and agreeable companion, and personally much liked, apart from all political partisanship. As private secretary and Chef du Cabinet, he was a zealous and confidential servant of the Emperor, for whom he seems to have felt a very strong attachment in earlier years, when none but the immediate followers of Prince Louis Napoleon had any expectation of his ever obtaining the throne.

SKETCHES FROM BRITISH COLUMBIA.

As a sequel to the views of Douglas and Harrison Lake, which appeared in our last week's Paper, we give one, a bird's-eye view, of the little town of Lillooett, situated on the right bank of the Fraser River, 214 miles from the port and capital, New Westminster. It is about half way to the Cariboo gold-diggings; and, as it is one of the best positions for inland traffic, many of the Douglas merchants keep stores here to supply the upper country. The neighbouring banks of the river have during the last three years proved rich in gold, being in many instances more remunerative to the worker than the mines of Cariboo. One long street constitutes the town; but more attention has been paid to the uniformity and style of buildings here than at Douglas and elsewhere, so that Lillooett—being located in a fine, open country, surrounded by delightful scenery—has a very pleasing appearance. At present it is the terminus for the stages. A waggon-road, commencing on the opposite side of the river, will soon be completed to the upper country, when the accommodation for the traveller will be very greatly extended, and the journey to the mines will become a pleasure-trip. The Fraser River flows by here with great rapidity, and the want of a bridge is greatly felt, as the only method, up to the present time, for conveying passengers and goods across is by boats, while cattle and horses have to swim across.

Port Anderson, on Anderson Lake, is the subject of our second Illustration. This port and town, though at present in "embryo," is pleasantly situated; and its bit of clear land will not fail to cheer the heart of the traveller, after having journeyed through so many miles of dense pine forest. Anderson Lake (fifteen miles in length) is, like all the others, bounded by lofty romantic but sterile mountains. The passage by steamer occupies about an hour and a half, landing us on a narrow neck of land, little over a mile in width, through which a tramroad is laid down for conveyance of freight. At the end of this portage we reach Seton Lake, sixteen miles in length. Again we embark in a small steamer, and in two hours land at Port Seton.

HARMONIUM GALLERY,
209, Regent-street, W.

CRAMER'S ENGLISH PIANETTE, 7½ octaves, is the newest and most perfect production of this eminent firm, and is now regularly in the hall of Messrs. Cramer, Beale, and Wood, 201, Regent-street, W., for inspection and sale. It produces the full power of the piano when required, and is strengthened much more regularly than an oil cut instrument from the fact that it has no incision. In rosewood or walnut, 36 gs.; in oak, 34 gs.
Purchasers are particularly requested to observe that this instrument has no trade-mark or name on the outside, but the double or check action; and that Cramer and Co. were the original manufacturers.

BROADWOOD'S NEW DRAWING-ROOM GRAND, price 135 guineas in Rosewood, and the gallery in Walnut.—CRAMER and CO. (limited) have to direct attention to the extensively stocked and greatly advanced new Pianofortes, which, for the present season, they have determined to offer for sale. In particular, the Pianofortes of the great makers of the past will be strengthened much more regularly than on an old instrument from the hall in which they are let on hire. In rosewood or walnut, 36 gs. and 40 gs.
Purchasers are particularly requested to observe that this instrument has no trade-mark or name on the outside, but the double or check action; and that Cramer and Co. were the original manufacturers.

BROADWOOD'S NEW DRAWING-ROOM GRAND, price 135 guineas in Rosewood, and the gallery in Walnut.—CRAMER and CO. have selected from the manufactories of those celebrated makers the most perfect instruments, which, as regards tone and touch, they have put from purchased. They are very greatly in advance of the usual class of cottage pianofortes, and are strongly recommended to parties about to furnish. Cramer and Co.'s cottages at 50 guineas, which after three years given the instrument to the hirer without further payment. Pianettes, from the largest to the smallest size.—201, Regent-street.

COLLARD'S NEW SEMI-GRAND, price 110 guineas.—CRAMER and CO. exhibit the largest selection of Collard's Pianofortes. Pianettes Gallery (the largest in Europe), 209 and 209, Regent-street.

ERARD'S NEW DOUBLOIR GRANDS, in Rosewood and Walnut, 130 guineas.—In Walnut.—CRAMER and CO. have selected from the manufactories of those celebrated makers the most perfect instruments, which, as regards tone and touch, they have put from purchased. They are very greatly in advance of the usual class of cottage pianofortes, and are strongly recommended to parties about to furnish. Cramer and Co.'s cottages at 50 guineas or hire, which after three years given the instrument to the hirer without further payment.—Pianettes Gallery (the largest in Europe), 207 and 209, Regent-street.

CRAMER and CO. LET on HIRE new COTTAGE PIANOFORTES, 7½ octaves, Rosewood, Cabinet and Brass, at from 20 to 25 guineas per annum, and at the end of three years the hirer has the option of purchasing the instrument for a small additional payment. Also paid quarterly.—Pianettes Gallery (the largest in Europe), 207 and 209, Regent-street.

CRAMER and CO. (in answer to numerous applications) beg to intimate that the terms for hiring for three years have been in all parts of the United Kingdom, satisfactorily reduced, and that they continue to have on hire the only unexceptionable pianofortes.—Pianettes Gallery (the largest in Europe), 207 and 209, Regent-street.

INDIAN PIANOFORTE. — CRAMER and CO. (in consequence of the high reputation which a recently CONTRACT PIANOFORTE, to suit all climates, with metallic bracings and all the latest improvements, has obtained for them in India) have determined to offer the instrument for sale. Its tone, touch, durability, and elasticity of action are believed upon the manufacturer of the most perfect pianoforte for the tropical climates, and the only one which has ever obtained the Government contract. Cramer and Co. deliver these instruments C.I.F. to London in cases lined with zinc, at 40 guineas each, for 25 octaves, and 35 guineas for 24 octaves, viz. 44 in., depth 2ft. 2½ in.
Pianettes Gallery, 207 and 209, Regent-street, London.

BOOSEY and CO.'S MINIATURE PIANOS, price 17 guineas, in a Walnut case, full octaves. This pianoforte, although of the smallest size, has the full Grand Piano before the public, and is the only one that can be obtained, and the workmanship is of the best description.—Hill-street.

BOOSEY and CO.'S 25-GUINEA PIANO is in a light and elegant Rosewood case, with every modern improvement and suitable for any drawing-room. The touch is elastic and responsive, full tone, very telling and equally distributed throughout the entire compass.—Hill-street.

BOOSEY and CO.'S 35-GUINEA PIANO is in a handsome Walnut case, with all the latest improvements, and is a most valuable instrument, for the price may be truly considered cheap, as the rosewood case for the rosewood instrument, as well as the workmanship and tone.—Hill-street.

BOOSEY and CO.'S SIX-GUINEA HARMONIUM (The Cottage) is a most useful and agreeable tone, suitable for a small room.—Boosey and Co., Hill-street.

BOOSEY and CO.'S TEN-GUINEA HARMONIUM (The School) has a powerful tone, suitable for class-singing or a school-room.—Boosey and Co., Hill-street.

BOOSEY and CO.'S CHURCH HARMONIUMS, 18, 20, 25, 30, and 40 guineas, are very powerful instruments, as suitable for chants of worship. Catalogues of all Harmoniums and Piano applications.—Hill-street.

CASE'S ENGLISH CONCERTINAS, which still maintain their unrivalled reputation, possess a rapid speech, good quality of tone, and facility in more than one clear Concertinas. Prices, 4 to 12 guineas.—BOOSEY and CO., Holles-st.

BOEHM'S SEVEN-GUINEA PERFECTED CYLINDER FLUTE, all sections of fluency, with the advantages of the cylinder. Many years' experience, possess all the advantages of the cylinder. Solid silver head-joint, with open holes, without chimney, the finest workmanship of the eighteen-keyed flute; in addition to which, through Dr. Pratten's ingenious improvement, the second octave is produced by simple covers on the first finger of the left hand. All the resources of the system of equitempo tone fully available. An illustrated Treatise may be had on application to the manufacturers.
BOOSEY and CO., 24, Holles-street, W.

MUSICAL BOXES for CHRISTMAS PRESENTS.—BOOSEY and CO. beg to announce the receipt of a large supply of MUSICAL BOXES from the celebrated Nicole, Frères, Geneva, which they are selling at the lowest prices. The newest and most popular airs are added monthly, including selections from "Semiramide," &c. Lists upon application.—24, Holles-street, W.

CHRISTMAS SUPPLEMENT

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 24, 1864.

A VISIT TO THE OLD FOLK ON CHRISTMAS EVE.

HOME is the parent and protector of all the virtues. Round the domestic hearth they most thoroughly ripen, as in their native soil and clime. Watching the great maelstrom of business in our cities, and thinking of the hardening tendency of money-getting pursuits, and the wear and tear of life, mental as well as physical, which they occasion, one is thankful to know that most of the persons thus fiercely engaged in the battle of life have homes, where, at the close of each day's work, they repose in slippered ease, surrounded by the softening and purifying influence of the household deities. In this genial atmosphere carking cares soon thaw, wrinkles smooth out, and the whole being is tranquillised; so that the next morning sees them renovated for the daily struggle; and many carry with them, it is to be hoped, some of the home influence into their business haunts, lighting up their countenances and softening their intercourse with their fellowmen. Nor is it among the wealthy alone that home exercises its beneficial influence. The poorest, except a few unhappy outcasts, bask also in its sacred warmth. The love of husband and wife, of children and parents, of brothers and sisters, is not restricted to any class. This priceless boon, like all God's gifts, is common to all. It is as free as light, and air, and sunshine,—and have we not the poet's warrant that the sun shines as sweetly on cottage thatch as on palace roof?

The Lares and Penates have in these modern times two important auxiliaries which former ages lacked—the penny post and the rail. Both help mightily to keep alive the sacred flame in the hearts of absent ones, especially of the humbler classes, by enabling them to communicate more freely and frequently with the Old Folk, and at holiday times to visit them. But their chief helpmate now, as of old, is Merry Christmas. It would be a sin against England—merry England then no more—and for the home affections, if Christmas Day were to meet the fate of May Day, and be no longer kept. Of that, happily, there is no fear. Though shorn of some of its mummeries and changed somewhat in form, we have the spirit still; and it will endure as long, we trust, as the religion whose founder's birthday (heralded by angels' songs) it commemorates. Hail, Christmas! season of mirth and glee and good cheer to all of all; of carols and waits; of trees which bear other fruit than that with which Nature graced their boughs; of holly and mistletoe (dear to lads and lasses); of yule logs and ashen faggots, seeking their blazing repose on chimney-piece down which on the morrow Father Christmas will perchance tumble, laden with toys; of spiced ales, roast beef and plum-pudding, mince-pies, and snap-dragon; of dances and charade-actings, of pantomimes and mummers, of magic-lanterns, and all indoor joys; season when Punch and Judy, accompanied by their dog Toby, exhibit in carpeted rooms instead of by the roadside; when the hearts of town folk are made glad with hampers crammed with game, and poultry, and fowls—the gaps filled with rosy-cheeked apples, which, tumbling on the floor as the hamper is opened, send the children scampering after them, wild with delight; when grocers' and fruiterers' shops shine with a tempting splendour they exhibit at no other year; when (so potent and universal is the sway of Father Christmas) even workhouse inmates make glad—grim guardians relaxing and making presents of tea to the women, tobacco to the men, and toys to the children, whilst there is a profusion of roast beef and plum-pudding and nut-brown ale for all. In town and country, in farmhouse and cottage, as well as in baronial hall, everywhere throughout merry England (merry on that day, at any rate), Christmas holds court in cozy comfort and receives from all classes loving homage.

If one could take a peep into all the houses in England on Christmas Day, what scenes of domestic happiness would be witnessed! Friends long sundered or estranged clasping hands again; lovers meeting, timidly bashful, or with frank recognition; families, many of whose members had not seen each other since the preceding Christmas-tide, again joined, and, amid a chorus of chirruping kisses, sobs, laughter, and children's prattle, pouring out, all together, the year's budget of domestic news.

One of these family meetings forms the subject of our illustration on the preceding page, and happily has our Artist depicted the scene. Here we have one of the well-to-do families—not rich, and certainly not poor—with which England abounds, and which form the bone and muscle of the nation. There is no need of the locality of which this scene, for every county, and indeed every parish, of England has at Christmas time many such scenes. The first hearty greetings over, the young mother, with natural pride, hurries the baby to the grandmother. How tenderly, nay reverently, the dame, grasping her daughter's hand and shoulder the while, gazes on the dear innocent's face—another daughter looking lovingly on! Who can fathom the old lady's feelings as she looks on the child with wistful remembrances? Her thoughts go back to the time when its mother lay a babe in her arms? Or is she thinking of some loved lost one who once nestled in her bosom? There is in these faces of matured age something only in those of women, an expression of deep pathos. The graces of youth are past, the cheeks no longer wear a rosy hue, the eyes have ceased to sparkle, and each furrow across the tomb of a departed joy, of a frequently may be seen in their stead a mournful beauty, which is inexpressibly touching; and the countenance, though showing traces of deep yet chastening sorrow, is lighted up with a radiance almost divine. Return we, however, to our picture. The baby is handed graciously to their grandfather; and soon, you may be sure, they will be perched on his knees, rifling his pockets. The dog, sharing their delight, shows his demonstrative joy by leaping around the hearse and fearlessly bounding around the group, claiming recognition, for is he not one of the family? Tenderly the father is about to lift from the belly-covered cart their youngest, except the baby in arms. The eldest daughter—father's pride and mother's delight—is like a good daughter and an attentive sister, has stayed in the cart to resist the others safely out. One sees at a glance that she is mother's right hand: she quickly fills baskets, and with dainties between the younger ones in a twinkling, has needle and thread always at hand to fasten a loose button or to repair a rent, does not disdain to darn stockings, is a notable maker of pies and puddings, and is, in short, skilled in all housewifely arts. Yet is she no formal frump, but has her pleasant weaknesses, and is a true daughter of Eve. See! the sly creature holds a branch of mistletoe in her hand, too precious a treasure to be lost to others' care. Rare sport, be sure, will be had under that bough when it is mounted aloft—the cynosure, though not seemingly seen, of lovers' eyes. One would not be greatly surprised if the youth by the door, too timid, seemingly, to offer his assistance to the fair girl whom his gaze is so ardently fastened, were to take heart of grace, and, waxing bolder by acquaintance, claim, and, after a struggle more or less hard, gain, from her hands under its white berries. But the future's cares are not quite over. One duty remains to be done before he can, with an easy conscience, join the family circle in that flood of rosy light, of which we catch a glimpse through the open door. The horse that has taken them safely so many miles must first be attended to, for that is a charge that can be delegated to no one. So Bobbin is led to the stable, receiving, as the way thither many a loving pat on the neck and fondling caress, to which he responds in such wise, inspector ways—neighings and nose-rubbings—as are given to the poor dumb brute wherewith to express his joy and gratitude. And while the master attends to his horse's wants and comforts, well littering his stall, and giving him, in honour of the festive occasion, a double allowance of oats, that he, too, may in his way "rejoice and be glad," a host of tender and sacred remembrances crowd, perforce, on the man's mind. Was it not on the sacred day of which this is the eve that One who brought "good tidings of great joy," and whose taking on Him man's estate he and his, with millions more, have met to commemorate, was born in a stable and laid in a manger? Straightway the place is invested with a cathedral-like sanctity, and he moves reverently about, as though in the presence of angels. Thus are the commonest things hallowed by the remembrance of their sacred uses. In the distance, steeped in moonlight, stands the village church, suggestive of weddings and christenings yet to come in this happy family, and in hundreds of other families of which this is the type. Even now its bells are pealing audibly enough to all save regular ears—A Merry Christmas and a Happy New Year!

THE ROUNDHEAD'S PAROLE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "ABEL DRAKE'S WIFE."

CHAPTER I.

CHRISTMAS EVE.

"Pardon me," he said, "but we must not be interrupted."

"About soon to-day," began the Chaplain—while his fingers played restlessly with the little Hebrew Bible slipped into his girdle as if it had been the hilt of a sword, "I saw from the windows of the west gate-house a strange man trying to undo the fastening of the postern inside. I went down into the court, and upon my approaching him he began straight to bow and scrape in a clownish manner, and to roll out from the door as if he had been in liquor. On my asking his business, he explained, in a deep guttural voice, that a cart and horse standing in the court belonged to him, and that he thought to get it out by the postern to save him going round to the barbican, through which he had come in the morning with a load of corn. I told him he might see that the door was too narrow for his cart to pass through, and watched him out at the barbican and well away. This evening, on coming out of the chapel, I saw some man climbing over the wall from the rose-garden to the inner court. I ran towards him and seized his collar as he came to the ground. It was my comrade-in-dress that trailed on the floor, the queenly effect of which was somewhat marred by a tiny cap of the same, ornamented with pearls, set on the top of her head, giving a most piquant expression to the whole.

Her face was being held back by two hands now; her lips were pouting like a child's, and two tears were rolling down her cheeks; but her large, blue eyes were raised, and seemed to be promising an undying love and faith, which promise those other eyes looking down upon her drank in thirstily, surely demanding more and more, like a traveller drinking at the last well before he enters the desert, in which there is neither spring nor ground.

There was about as much conspiracy in those two faces as in the angels' in the pictorial allegory above them. Their sorrow was all for themselves and for each other. In their long, sad gaze they did not seem to ask, "How will it end?" But only, "When? when?"

Sir John's first feeling was only a deepening of that sudden pain that had seized him when he heard a man's voice in Dorothy's room, in the gallery. All his grief and passion were centred in her; but on looking in her face, so full of love, he began to ask himself how that love could have been won. He knew it could not have been given very willingly, and his heart swelled with rage at the means which must have been adopted by the daring intruder before him. How many times had he been here? Had he reported all he had heard and seen of the arrangements of the castle to Marbeck? But in a minute all these thoughts gave way to one which filled him with a fierce joy. He had the daring intruder in his power! He looked towards Marbeck's Hold, and his lips broke apart with an exultant smile. He had him in his power—he who had turned what might have been a certain ending into a miserable defeat; he whom he at all time more hated for having once cherished kindly feelings towards him and certain hopes of him stronger than he had owned even to himself. This man—so ungrateful, so rebellious, so dangerous, was absolutely in his power.

Drawing his eyes away from him with reluctance, Sir John turned and went round the parapet as far as the loophole at the south-west angle.

He looked in, and saw two dusky armed figures sitting on the steps.

"Here!" he said; and they rose with one silent movement. "Go to my——" He stopped abruptly, then went on. "Have you been here before, either of you?" "No, Sir John," answered both the men. Then he continued, "Go to the door of the fourth room from the stairs, and bolt it, and wait there for me."

He heard the grating of their heels as they turned, and then retraced his steps rapidly to the little window.

By this time the young Captain was smiling into Dorothy's anxious face from under the shade of the great absorbed hat, and her little fingers were tugging at the collar of the coat to make it more effectually conceal his face.

"Ah! mercy!" she cried, clasping her hands with despair. "I should know you at a glance, even thus. Surely the angel that led St. Peter from prison must attend you if you escape this night."

Sir John returned him no answer, but, stepping up to him, seized him rudely by the shoulder.

"Gilbert Saxby, come forth with me!" he said.

Saxby wrenched himself from his hold, saying, haughtily,

"Lead, Sir, lead; I follow."

Sir John led the way into the adjoining room, and Captain Saxby, throwing one look on Dorothy, who stood watching them like a statue of stone, followed.

Sir John kept him waiting a minute while he went to the door to see that the men were there, and while the young Puritan stood watching him he seemed suddenly to become conscious of where he was, for he laid his head and looked around him with a tender reverence approaching to awe, as if he had come into some holy place, the sanctuary of a pure and spotless soul. Sir John saw, but took little note of this action at the time, but afterwards he recalled it with a certain sense of pleasure, which had in his irritation, and Dorothy became dearer to him each time he thought of it.

"Now!" said Colonel Hyde. And Saxby, with a slight inclination of the head, approached the door and followed him as he led the way along the gallery, the two men keeping just behind.

Attracted by the unusual noise of the footsteps, Lady Letitia came hurrying from her room with a light in her hand. At the sight of Saxby she raised his hat to her and uttered a cry.

"It is nothing," said her husband; "we have merely taken a spy. You had better go to Dorothy, she has been affrighted." Then, seizing the light she held, he gave it to one of the men, saying,

"Go forward.

In answer to the man's inquiring look, he added, sternly,

"To the dungeon!"

The man led the way down the stone stair; Sir John followed him, and behind went the other man and Captain Saxby side by side. At the word spy, the prisoner had started and turned upon Sir John with a disdainful face; but, controlling himself immediately, had passed on in silence.

Lady Letitia and her frightened women stood watching the little red light as it receding to the footsteps as they went down lower and lower into the dark depths—below the first gallery, below the basement, and then down still, as if the very earth opened to receive them.

CHAPTER IV.

THE DUNGEON.

Some hours later into the cell where Gilbert Saxby, through the open grating of his dungeon, saw a flickering light approaching, and raised himself on his bed of rushes in some surprise. Two figures appeared on the threshold.

"I will await you here," said the Rev. Mr. Saulcote, unlocking the door and motioning to Dorothy to enter alone.

She went in timidly, shading her lamp with her hand, lest the damp air should blow it out, and so threw a vivid radiance on her face, and made her fingers appear like transparent bars of crimson light.

Mr. Saulcote could not see her through the grate, but he saw the prisoner looking at her with dazzled eyes—not inquiringly, or with astonishment, but completely absorbed in the delight of seeing her.

"Is it the angel of St. Peter come for me?" he said, kissing her dress with passionate joy.

Dorothy shrank back a little.

The Rev. Mr. Saulcote did not hear more, distinctly; for Dorothy, having signed to Captain Saxby that he was waiting outside, Saxby spoke in whispers, as she did. Sometimes the voices got louder, Saxby's in almost indignant remonstrance and Dorothy's in earnest pleading. Sitting on the shelving stone of the wall, the Chaplain listened; and, at some of the hesitancies and broken sentences he caught, his face—had light come suddenly upon it—would have been a picture of conflicting but smothered passion.

"There, in that case," said Dorothy, ceasing to plead, and speaking coldly and clearly—"in that case, do not ask me to believe in your love any longer."

To avoid hearing Saxby's passionate protestations in answer, the Chaplain rose, wiped his wet forehead, and paced a few steps in the darkness. When he reached the grate again, Dorothy was speaking; at first low, then loud enough for him to catch the words,

* * * * * *

"You do not love me. I shall know that, and my heart will break; but I shall know it for a surety. You do not love me unless you can say, 'Thy people shall be my people.'"

* * * * * *

Again she murmured, "Oh, Gilbert! I, that never asked a thing of you before: see me on my knees intreating you, imploring you!"

"Has he made of more stuff to resist this?" thought the Chaplain. Should I resist it?"

"Ah! Dorothy, Dorothy!" said the Captain. "Would St. Peter's angel have come to betray his master before she let him forth?"

"Ay, would she not," cried Dorothy, "if he had taken such a master as you have taken? Would she not try to win him back to the true master and the true cause, that which his own heart first told him was the true?"

"No, Dorothy; you wrong me. I am young and have been foolish; have cared little about these mighty questions of State; but, so far as I have thought at all, my conscience has been against the King."

"But not your feelings?"

"Perhaps not."

"First then, then, as I do."

Captain Saxby only smiled, but the thought that had given birth to the smile changed, and he looked with sad affection in Dorothy's face.

"I know," she said, "that once you loved the King; you told me so. You have owned to me often with tears, and you have laid your head with the blood of those that hold him dear as life? Gilbert, it is the blood of my father and of all my kinsmen you seek to shed. Oh! Gilbert, in such a cause as yours, the treachery is deeper true!"

"Enough," said Captain Saxby, still with the same earnest, clinging look, but more coldly in tone and words than he had yet spoken. "This is sorry comfort that you bring me, gentle mistress."

The Chaplain saw Dorothy approaching the grate with her lamp, then saw her suddenly turn back, and heard her once more pleading with the prisoner passionately, and mingling sobs with entreaties.

In a few minutes the door was thrown open, and Dorothy appeared, her eyes sparkling and her face radiant.

"Mr. Saulcote," she said, laying her hand on his arm, "will you, if you please, come hither?"

Mr. Saulcote, with a vague feeling that he was going to do something despicable, looked at the Chaplain as if the thought were his, and he—the Captain—intended to resist it.

"Will you, Colonel Sir John Hyde," he said, stiffly, "that I agree to his proposal. I agree to leave as a prisoner on parole, and withdraw my men from Marbeck's Hobi. The tide suits at six to-morrow morning; if the barges are ready, they shall come back, bringing my men and me with the tide. This I agree to do on two conditions, the first being that I give warning to the fort of our final withdrawal when we reach the river's side; and the second, that no attack be made or planned by my return. Will you report this to Colonel Hyde? Or shall I see him?"

"I shall report it, and if he pleases he will see you," answered the Chaplain, turning down the lamp.

He soon returned, but alone.

"I have made known your conditions to Colonel Hyde, and he consents to abide by them. But he wishes you to remember you are not to leave this fort till you have performed your promise."

"Tell him I pledge my word that I will return, if I have power to do so, under any circumstances. I am a prisoner on parole."

"Follow me, then."

* * * * * *

"Yes. And now, Colonel Sir John Hyde," cried Mr. Saulcote, standing before him with hands laid palm to palm, and his rich, deep voice trembling with the earnestness of his speech, "and now, Sir, watching for so long is ripe—ripe, and ready to drop into your mouth."

"How?"

"Do you not see that while Saxby is packing his men on the barges who are coming—for what, think you?—to your assistance? Ha! ha! is there not a fair lady to be carried off? Why start? Your course is clear as daylight. Have you the beacon lighted. Call together all friends as if to meet the expected attack. March to Eversly in the dark. Wait in the wood till Saxby and his men are in their barges, and then—why, then scale the orchard wall and pluck your fruit."

CHAPTER V.

WHAT THE BARGES BROUGHT BACK.

The barges went down to Eversly next morning with the sluggish tide, and the snow-clouds opened and shook their feathery burdens down on them as they went. A little before noon, just as the snow ceased and the sun came out a red and joyless ball, Captain Saxby and his men left Marbeck's Hold, and appeared at the riverside.

"Now, then," said he to a lad whom two men held between them, "run back as fast as you like; tell your uncle Marbeck we are gone to join the garrison at Chillington, and that I give him fair notice. No attack will be made for at least two hours, if at all. Off!"

He saw the boy dart off, and he and his party separating one knot of men from the rest for the first barge, when a heavy discharge of musketry made the barges vibrate one against the other.

"What is that?" cried Saxby, while his sword suddenly drone bare as if by an movement of his own arm.

A fearful clamour followed—confused and indistinct, but horrible.

"God protect me! I see it all!" said the Captain, his hand quivering and his face white with rage and the fear of his own eternal dishonour. "And of all the foul knavery ever hatched under Heaven—but hold! Out, boys! out! Come out of their black boat, and shake the dust of it off your feet. Now, God be my witness! I break, I spit upon my compact with these cowards. They teach us, before it is too late, how to value their cause! I call upon you, one and all, to return. Back boys! and on 'em, like the old wolves of the den! What is that you hear? Hark! Back down? Together! Follow up! Strike with the sword of Gideon! Down with them like chaff!"

Let friends and foes alike know we are here! Shout 'God our strength!' and it to the devil with the King and his treacherous gang!"

The barges went heavily back to Chillington with the returning tide, not with Saxby and his men, and yet not empty, but each with a ghastly and groaning load—the dead, dying, and wounded Cavaliers whom Saxby and the garrison had laid low. A little after sunset a weary and straggling band (see shown in our Engraving on page 641) returned to the castle through the chestnut avenue to find the beacon flaring still. In the rear of this melancholy troop came the Chaplain. He leaned heavily on his stick, and now and then also supported himself by the arm of Wilfred the Broad, who walked beside him. The man kept stopping and looking at the Chaplain, as if he momentarily expected him to fall. He had been in the very thick of the fight, wearing armour that had concealed him, and had received a wound in the neck. But he had, though resting to fight, and while getting rid of his armour, declared it to be trifling, and refused to wait and return with the barges. He had not got half way across the courtyard, however, when he fell down in a faint. When they had laid him on his bed he revived sufficiently to ask for Sir John, who instantly came.

"He signs for your ear," said the doctor to Sir John; and then he whispered, "he is dying."

Kneeling by the bed, Colonel Hyde inclined his ear to the Chaplain's white lips.

"Saxby," he whispered.

"Well?" asked Sir John.

"Honest—true—there was—another condition—no attack to be—made till his return."

"Ha!" muttered Colonel Hyde. "Your reason for not telling me of this?"

"Dorothy—I—loved—her, and meant"——

"What?" There was no answer. And Sir John continued, "To disgust Saxby with the alliance? Was that your reason for planning last night this foul onslaught? Well done! Thou art a godly priest, Sir Chaplain."

"Sir," interrupted the doctor, "they are seeking you without."

"See that this—this godly priest has all he needs," said Sir John, turning away. "Farewell! Mr. Saulcote. Perchance you can smooth your own deathbed, as you have done so many others. As for me, I should prove but an uncomfortable nurse. Your wrong to me I readily forgive; but to play upon these children—oh, fie! fie!"

"Sir!" exclaimed a servant, as he went to the great hall. "Captain Saxby is at the gates, demanding admittance."

"And no one has shot him down?" furiously demanded Sir John. "He is wounded, and alone, Sir!"

"Wounded! Alone!" echoed Sir John, in his bewilderment.

"Yes, Sir. Will you see him?"

"See him! He has beaten us. Isn't that enough? Very well. Conduct him here."

Captain Saxby entered, walking slowly, with short, set, but faltering steps, that he had to make to clearly. His pale, bloodless face told why. So also did his right arm, which was bound with a handkerchief Sir John well knew as Dorothy's—which, doubtless, she had given to him—and which had been used to stanch the fast-flowing red tide of life.

No traces of victory or triumph were to be seen in his face. On the contrary, it revealed only a settled gloom, which looked too thick for any future light to have power to pierce.

"I understand why you come," said Sir John, regarding him with an aspect akin to his own. "To charge me with treachery; but the treachery of this day is the work of one whose soul is even now approaching his God." And he told briefly the Chaplain's dying words.

Saxby listened with surprise and emotion.

"It gives me marvellous comfort to hear this," he said. "I'd rather such a piece of villainy be laid on the shoulders of the most priestly man alive than on my father's friend. But, Sir, you mistake my errand now; however heavily this lay to my heart. I did not come to make a blab about it now. There is my sword."

"Well?" said Colonel Hyde.

"Do you forget?" asked Saxby, with a faint smile.

"What?"

"That I am a prisoner on parole."

The Colonel looked at him with moist eyes. He had, in the current of so much more serious matter for thought, forgotten all about the parole.

"Saxby!" he said, holding out his hand, which the young man grasped, "I have spent much of my poor wealth in the King's service, and, on the whole, have gained little but honour for the gold. Let me enrich him with one more noble heart. Saxby, come to me: I will make you my heir; I will give you Dorothy. Come! and let me forget the one great want of my life—a son! Come, boy, come!"

With a smile on his face and a mist in his blue eyes the Puritan Captain listened, and, as he finished, he bent and touched the veteran's bronzed hand with his lips. Then, still holding it in both hands, he said,

"First of all, have I my liberty?"

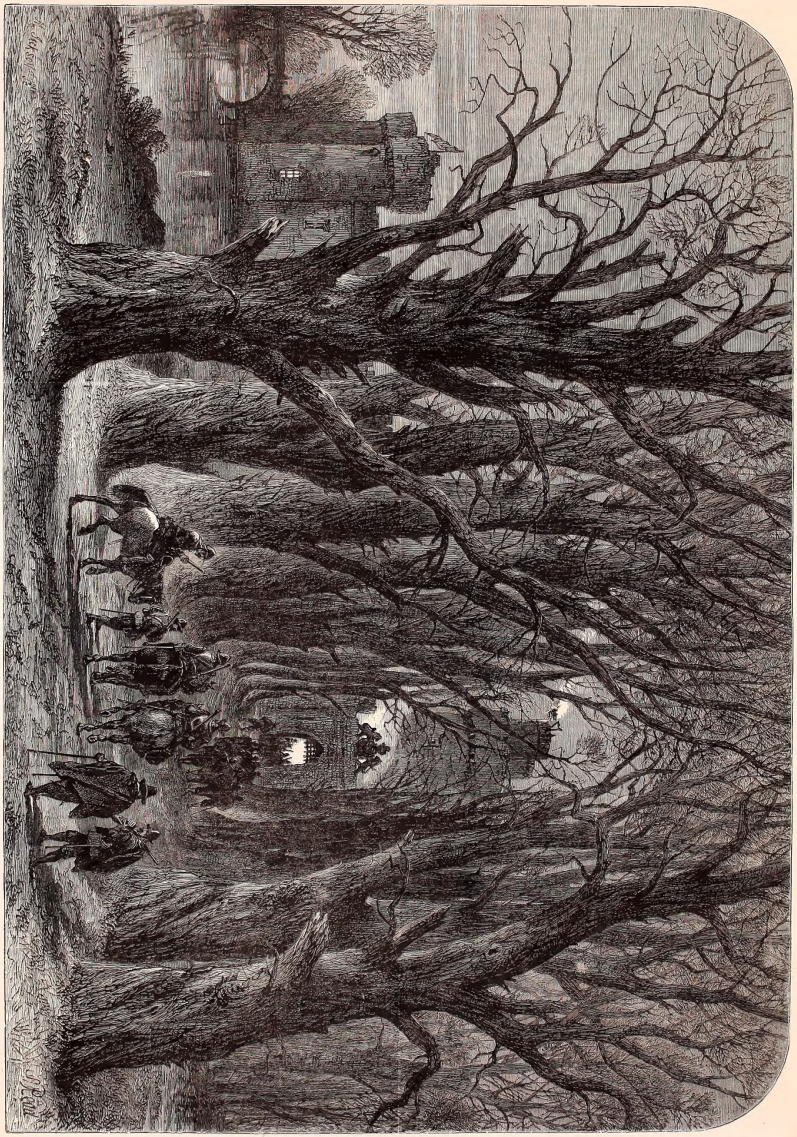
"Certainly!"

"Then, Sir John, the first use I make of it must be to decline I will never desert my cause again."

He wrung Sir John's hand, dropped it, and buckled on his sword.

CHAPTER VI.

HIGHGATE FIELDS, A.D. 1649.



One sunny morning in the May of 1649, a young man, a soldier was leisurely sauntering across Highgate Fields. Now and then he would inquire his way of a passer-by, pursue the indicated path a little while, then lose his way again, suddenly discover he had lost it, and lie down in the white daisies till some one passed of whom he might ask it once more. He lay near a little brook, his chin resting in his hands, his elbows in the grass. The heat of the sun, the aromatic perfume of the breeze, the fanning motion of the green branches, and the twittering of the birds made him drowsy, and he fell into a kind of waking sleep, or rather he dreamed with his eyes open and fixed upon the tiny brook. In his dream the brook grew and spread till it became a stately river; and from the mean little cottage on the other side of it great gables began to shoot, till at last it took the shape of the old Manor House at Eversly. These in time fell away, and it was only a little black cottage again. Then it began to spread grandly—great walls, with many towers, sprang round it, and a castle stood there dismantled ruined, and black with fire. Looking on this, the young man buried his face in the grass and cried,

"How will they receive me? Poor outcasts, poor wanderers!"

Presently he rose and went forwards a long cross-bar gate, that swung back on one hinge at his touch. Entering, and pushing his way between low-growing boughs of lilac and fruit trees gay with blossom, he found himself close to a large cottage porch, formed of trellis-work, overrun with woodbine and ivy. Two pans of milk stood just outside it, which great dog was guarding. A pretty little lass, or rather apparent to have just finished that meal. A fair and buxom young woman, with a baby in her arms, sat facing him, and a white-haired man sat with his back towards the door. There seemed to be another person, or other persons, whom he could not see.

"It's no use talking at her, Sir," said the woman with the child in her arms. "Mistress Dorothy's dead set against him; and you might talk to Stonesbay and never turn her."

"And is it that you cannot like your cousin, Dorothy?" inquired the old man of her, aside, as she rose and stood in the sunshine opposite the trellis.

"Nay, I like him as well as I care to like him."

She was as fair as ever, though her face was more that weary, keen look of hungry love that has tasted no food for years but the dry crust of memory.

"What is it, then, my Dorothy?" said her father. "Is it for the sake of him? Tell me. Surely it is not any hope?"

The face smiled patiently in its weariness :—

"Oh, no!" she said; "no hope."

"What then, my child?"

"Love for him, father, I think; just that alone."

They stood silent a minute, and then the man turned and entered the cottage, and Dorothy, left alone, leaned her head dreamily against the trellis in the May sunshine, and let the ready tears core slowly from her weary eyes.

The pleasant May time was the saddest of all seasons to her, like a time once heard in a tune of happiness played over and over to her in her sorrow. All her heart cried, Hush, hush! Yet it went on with its memory tune. She let her eyes from the sunshine this sweet morning, and cried out in that exceeding woe that takes the voice to bear it to the air by no will of our own.

"Oh, happy mother, in thy cold, deaf grave!"

She heard Maude's heavy hob-nailed footsteps, and saw her stooping, with the child in one arm, to take up a pan of milk under the other, and could hear her leather stays creaking as she rose with her double burden.

"Hey, lad's mercy!" she cried, shrilly, staring straight before her, the milk flowing out of the pan through her ruddy fingers.

"What is it?" asked Dorothy.

Maude did not answer her, but began to draw back, as if the object of her astonishment was approaching nearer, and then Captain Saxby stood before Dorothy.

At first her heart stood still, then throbbed so as to delay her breath, and she felt as if she must shriek to recover it again. He threw himself before her, and she lifted her arms an instant over the bowed head, then drew away her dress and fled into the cottage.

Sir John, not thinking of how his last remark of changing his me' uncholy life had just been ruined by Dorothy's rejection of her cous, , who had not been committed injuriously by the war, and, though a Royalist blood, was liked by the Republicans. He might have secured, possibly, Sir John's pardon—perhaps, even, have got back the estate. Just then a hand was laid upon his shoulder. Looking up, he met Dorothy's eyes.

"Father, he is come."

"Who has come?"

"Gilbert Saxby."

Quick steps sounded, and Saxby stood before him, pale and silent.

"Oh, Saxby, Saxby!" cried the old Cavalier, shaking his grey head and looking at him with eyes flashing and wet with tears, "when will you Puritans have done with me? Ye have burnt my house, scattered my kinsmen, killed my King, and ye yet not satisfied?"

"Nay, Sir," returned Saxby, much affected, "when war is over and peace has come, a soldier may follow the device of his heart—mine lay in finding you and entreating you, when found, to let me accompany you to your kinsmen in Virginia, and there devote myself and my too-easily-acquired fortune to rebuilding yours and making you a new house in the New World, haunted by no sad memories. If it so happen that my cause shall need me again, I can return alone. But I do not think this will happen, for I am ill pleased at late doings. I had no part in the King's death."

He spoke that last looking sternly and fixedly into Saxby's face as he spoke. Then his head fell forward on his breast, and a round so like a sob escaped him that Dorothy stole to him and took the grey head in her arms.

"What say you, Dorothy," he asked, huskily; "shall we take the boy at his word, and give him this wretched heritage?"

"To me it is an heritage so rich," said Saxby, drawing nearer, "that I count it a mere daring thing the having asked it, than the doing any deed of battle."

Sir John rose and put Dorothy's hand in his.

"I'll make no bargain with thee," he said. "Dorothy is thine, thou deservest her; I give her thee unconditionally; she is thine. Now what wilt thou do?"

Clasping her with one arm, Captain Saxby held out the other, and said, with a smile bright as the May sun,

"Refuse her without her dowry."

The white-haired Cavalier looked at him a moment, then fell on his shoulder with a loud sob.

"Take me to my kinsmen in Virginia," he said.

"Thy people shall be my people," answered the Captain; and Dorothy looked up through her tears and smiled,

CAROL-SINGING IN YORKSHIRE.

IN every corner of our island this "sort of holy song," though set to secular music, is still sung. We hear it in the remote villages of the south and east; a Translation of the Royal Society has collected carols in the west; and we find singers of all ages in the north. Such ditties have for ages gladdened the feasts of royalty and cheered the lowly fare of the cottager. The carol is still sung in the stately halls of some of our colleges at Oxford. Christmas is welcomed with a carol and the grace-cup at Magdalen; and the boar's head is brought into the dining-hall of Queen's, decked with flowers and banners, to the old hymn of "Caput apri defero."

Let us leave these seats of learning, and see how the common people observe this charming custom. Goldsmith, in "The Vicar of Wakefield," writing about 1763, and laying the scene of his narrative "at a small cure in the north of England," relates that, among other customs which they retained, the inhabitants "kept up the Christmas carol." In 1811, a writer describes, in the North Riding of Yorkshire, "a set singing under his window on Christmas morn by young women and men." Our old friend William Hone tells us that, in 1825, as many as seventy carols were then published annually. In 1838, according to William Howitt, carols were frequently met with through Lancashire, Yorkshire, Northumberland, and Durham. And, even in towns, carol-singing has been much encouraged of late by the publication of several collections of carols with music.

Brand tells us that in his time carols were sung by little troops of boys and girls in the north of England, and the Engraving on page 649 represents such a scene. It is Christmas morning in Yorkshire, and a company of rustic children is here with the song of joy, some of them bearing evergreens and a "Christmas-tree;" as emblems of their mission. The cold is intense, echoing through the snowy stillness of the landscape, have called to the window the well-to-do master of the house, who, "with spectacles on nose," eyes the young throng with the kindly expression of age, which is well contrasted with the childish wonder of the little fellow peering out of the side window. The leader of the choir bears the "Christmas-tree;" though it is not gaily decked like our indoor Christmas-tree. He is intense; and his two vicegerents, with hollies and ivies, are proportionally earnest. The little fellow in somebody else's jacket is evidently a learner. The girls are equally attentive. The variety of the expression of the several singers is admirable. The dog seems about to bark in chorus. The following is their ditty :—

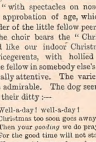
Christmas too soon goes away,
Then your pardons we do pray:
For the good time will not stay.
We are not singers time does bear,
But neighbours' children known before;
So gooding, pray;
We cannot stay,
But must away,
For the Christmas will not stay,
Well-a-day! well-a-day!

The little choir have evidently trudged through the snow on their mission, which the lively satisfaction of the folk at the window promises to recompense. The landscape is dreary winter; the trees bleak and stripped of their leaves; and the general effect would be depressing were it not for the cheerful hope associated with the sentiment of the singing, the smiling group of listeners, and the woodman who is toiling through the snow with a load of wood for fuel.

The term gooding is generally applied to alms collected in the above manner, commencing upon St. Thomas's Day, Dec. 21; but, in some localities, extended throughout the festive season, when, in the touching words of the poet, may



The Christmas Carol ring
Deep in my heart when I would sing;
Each of the twelve good days
The carnest relics of dotterers here and praise,
Ensuring happy mouths, and hallowing common ways.—Keble.

Miss Baker, in her "Northamptonshire Glossary," describes gooding as a St. Thomas's-day custom. In some villages they formerly went about with a two-handled pail, or pitching pot, begging furmety, or wheat for making it: her good old grandfather always on this day gave a bowl of wheat to any of the poor in the village who chose to come for it.

In such homely celebrations as the above are many traces of our National Life. We part from the pictures of the Christmas of centuries since as from one of Time's stately pageants, which bring the picturesqueness of the past into vivid contrast with the hospitalities of the present; reminding us that greater enjoyment is, with each returning season, scattered through the length and breadth of the land, and the accumulated wealth of England is thus brought home to every Englishman's fireside.

FLOWERS AND THOUSANDS.

BY MARK LEMON.

HE last lottery to be drawn in England was announced. Those old enough to remember that event will not fail to recall the golden promises made to stimulate the public to speculation, and the prizes of £5000, £10,000, and £20,000, secured to be within the reach of all who had the courage to invest a few paltry pounds in the wheel of fortune. The lottery was the general subject of conversation at every social gatherings in town and country, and the epidemic—for so it might be called—had spread to the market-tables round and about Little Grabley; but few of the careful, penny-saving farmers were taken in with the tempting bait, though four of the small tradesmen of the village clubbed together to buy "a sixteenth," and then fell into a state of painful perturbation, which lasted until the day of drawing, when the lucky shilling of a share in a prize of £5, amounting exactly to six shillings and threepence. The loudest declaimer against the folly of sending good money on such an errand was Farmer Gatherecole—old Sam Gatherecole; but he was called; but as he could neither read nor write, his opinion went for little, as it was concluded that he was necessarily ignorant of the great advantages to be obtained by the investment. He was known to have scraped—yes, scraped—a few pounds together by great industry and skilful management of his little farm of about 100 acres, and no one blamed him for being careful of what he had gathered together. Besides, he had no one to care for beside himself but his little niece, Jabez Coulterson—a good-tempered, handsome boy of twelve years, and who was kept as ignorant as his uncle of the great mysteries of reading and writing, for the satisfactory reason that, in Sam Gatherecole's sole very well-ordered house accomplishments, Jabez couldn't do better than follow his uncle's example. His neighbour, Mr. Grainger, did all he could in a friendly way to get Jabez sent to school, as the boy was a great favourite with all at Islip Farm (some 700 or 800 acres), which Mr. Grainger cultivated, and, in consequence, generally had "a voice potential as the Duke's in the parish of Little Grabley; but old Sam was proof against all honest independence, and would not change his treatment of the boy Jabez.

Farmer Gatherecole had been to London shortly before the drawing of the last great lottery, and those was a marked change in him from that time, as he was very fidgety at home, and more vehement in his condemnation of the lottery at the market-table and elsewhere. The day after the drawing he was at the Courtney Arms, where a newspaper was taken in, half an hour before the arrival of the coach which brought the paper from London, and appeared to be strangely preplexed when, in answer to his inquiry of "What number is won?" the landlord read out the list of prizes and the numbers which had gained them. From that day Sam Gatherecole never mentioned the lottery to anyone in Little Grabley.

He had his own reasons for this reticence, and you shall know them. Like many other ignorant men, Farmer Gatherecole was sly and suspicious, hardly caring to let his left hand know what his right hand did. He was very fond of money, working hard and honestly to obtain it, and he was greatly tempted to try his luck at the wheel of fortune, but, fearing to be laughed at if he should lose, or be pestered by needy neighbours if he should win, he cunningly decried the means whereby he resolved to obtain riches if he could.

Having sent two of his best beasts to Smithfield Market, he invested the money they brought in a lottery ticket, and was fortunate enough to win one of the great prizes. For ten long years he kept the secret of his good fortune, neither spending more nor labouring less, but remaining content with the enjoyment of knowing what a rich man he should day, and laughing at the people of Little Grabley.

When he died, his will was the wonder and talk of the country, and none ever surmised that the thirty odd thousand pounds which Samuel Gatherecole bequeathed his only relative, Jabez Coulterson, had come, mainly, out of the wheel of fortune. Nor was that the only surprise which agitated the minds of the Little Grableyans—Mr. Grainger, having engaged in a Chancery suit, became bankrupt, saving out of the wreck of his property barely enough to take Gatherecole's farm when it became vacant by old Sam's death. Neighbours said it would be a sad change for Miss Daisy, who had been brought up like a lady, playing the piany, some believed, though it was confessed that she had been often seen in the kitchen making pastry, or pickling and preserving, as a farmer's daughter ought to have done.

Mr. Jabez Coulterson did not forget his kind friends of Islip Farm now that he had become rich and a man of note. Joe, and he would have offered help if he had known how to set about it; but it seemed so strange that Mr. Grainger, for whom he had always entertained such respectful admiration, should be in a position to accept assistance from him that he had not the courage to obey the dictates of his kind heart. Mr. Grainger, too, was far too proud a man to trespass upon the pocket of his friend, however full it might be, and the more so as far as Jabez could see, he had made his change of fortune easy and confidential friend. Jabez did not suspect for some time that he had another reason for visiting the old farm than a desire to have Grainger's advice and counsel; but when his poor friend had pressed him to seek information from Miss Daisy herself, Jabez called at the house and tried to follow the suggestion, but found his mind so occupied with other thoughts than a desire to be acquainted with big A and bouncing B that he gave up the pursuit of knowledge in despair.

The truth was, he had fallen over head and ears in love with Daisy Grainger, and, sooth to say, she, estimating the good qualities of Jabez, had despite his want of culture and his money, conceived a great liking for him. Not to say despite his money, for that really stood in the way for a long time between her own desire and the confession of her love, as she feared that it might be thought, perhaps, by him, that she had listened to the jingling of his money-bags and not to the promptings of her own heart. We do not care to dwell upon the wooing of Jabez and Daisy, as it is with an incident in their married life we desire to point the moral and adorn our Christmas tale.

Mr. and Mrs. Jabez Coulterson occupied one of the prettiest residences in the neighbourhood of Little Grabley. It had attached to it quite a model farm, and Jabez found ample scope for active and refined amusement and employment to its proprietors. Jabez also rented the shooting over some 500 acres adjoining, as he was fond of his gun, and he could follow the sport without bringing himself much in contact with the neighbouring gentry, whose situation and former position making him diffident and embarrassed in the presence of strangers. His household consisted of Patty, his uncle's old housekeeper, two or three maid-servants, a groom, and a cook who was the cook who looked after the little farm in conjunction with Mr. Coulterson.

A frequent visitor was a cousin of Mr. Coulterson—Miss Millicent Grainger—whose chief aim at present seemed to be the conversion of one of another of Jabez's friends who could be a pretty face, a good temper, cheerful disposition, and three thousand pounds.

One fine December morning she was sitting in the dining-room of Lucy Hall (which had been named his house) looking vacantly at the ceiling—the while the kitten was playing with the ball of worsted which Milly ought to have been knitting into socks—and might have continued in her reverie for some time had not Miss Daisy entered the room on a visit of no enquiry, and who had had to speak twice before she could attract the attention of the young lady.

"Good gracious, Patty! How you made me jump!" said Miss Milly.

"So I see, Miss," replied Patty (who was quite a privileged person, and said whatever she pleased to every one in Lucy Hall); "and as you know how fond I be of you, you won't take it amiss if I speak a bit of my mind to you."

Patty then went on to say that she was sure something was going wrong with Miss Milly, as she was always dreaming—always, ever since the London visit—always in Mr. day-dreaming—always, ever since the London visit—always in Mr. Grainger's fields, for three days before; and concluded by declaring that Miss Milly went moping about like a hen with the croup.

Milly affected to laugh at this homely simile, and declared that Patty was an old goose for having such nonsense in her head. Mr. Fortescue was a friend of Mr. Coulterson—a friend he had met in London; but upon this declaration Patty joined issue, as Jabez had known only been in the neighbourhood for a fortnight in all his life. This little controversy was ended by the report of two gunshots near the house and the loud laughter of Mr. Coulterson, or Jabez, as we elect to call him.

Milly gave a little scream and ran to the window.

"Why, I do believe, Patty, that Mrs. Coulterson has been letting off a gun; she has one in her hand, and she and Jabez are laughing," said Milly.

"I shouldn't wonder," replied Patty, "for missus humours Jabez—I mean master—in everything, and she is a good wife to do so. They'll be wanting lunch, I take it, as we doesn't have dinner till five now you be here, Miss Milly." So saying, Patty left the room as Daisy knocked at the French window for admission.

Milly withdrew the bolt, and was terrified into running to the further side of the room, when Daisy asked her to take charge of the gun she was carrying.

"It's not loaded, silly one," said Daisy. "I have just discharged both barrels."

"Oh, Daisy? Never!" cried Milly.

"Indeed, I have," said Daisy; "Jabez showed me how to hold the gun, and seemed so pleased at the idea of my discharging it that I fired both barrels at his hat, and hit it too, Milly."

Jabez had never witnessed such a good joke, he declared; the crown of his hat had been riddled by the shot, and he now entered the house, laughing immoderately, and bearing in his hand Daisy's target.

"How could you have been so silly as to let me do it?" asked Daisy, smiling at sight of her handiwork.

"Do it?" replied Jabez, "why, if it had been my Sunday coe I shouldn't be cared. Daisy, I m proud of you, that I am. The first time of handlin' a gun, and you've riddled him finely. Next season I'll take out a license for thee, and we'll go shoot every day together."

"Well, not quite that, Jabez," said Daisy; "now and then, and without the license. Oh! here's lunch brought in by Patty herself, who, knowing how you like bacon, has provided a delicious piece. Eh, Patty?"

Before the old servant could reply, Jabez had taken her face between his hands, saying, "Bless your old wrinkles! If it was only Christmas time, and the mistletoe up, I'd give thee a kiss, I would."

"Don't wait for the mistletoe, Jabez," said Daisy; "I shan't be jealous."

"Then won't I" cried Jabez, kissing Patty; "take that, old girl; and not the first by the score."

No, nor by many a score; for, when Jabez was left an orphan, Patty had supplied almost the place of a mother to the curly-headed boy adopted by Farmer Gathercole.

Jabez was desirous, very desirous, to improve himself in all things; so, as he said, that his wife should not be always ashamed of her ploughman husband; but Daisy had a very unwilling pupil, and old habits took a long time to eradicate. As lunch proceeded, Jabez cut a slice of bacon, and, placing it upon a piece of bread as he had been accustomed to do in former days, began to eat it, to the horror of Miss Milly, who nudged Daisy, and begged her to tell him not be so very vulgar.

Daisy shook her head. Milly's mode of correction was not Daisy's. "She never made Jabez ashamed of himself," she said afterwards; "I always make him ashamed of me." And, in practical illustration of her theory, she cut a piece of bacon and bread as Jabez had done, and commenced preparations for eating it. Jabez saw what she was doing, and, taking the hint, transferred his "hunk," as he called it, to a plate, without saying a word, and Daisy as silently followed his example. And then their eyes met, and it was plain that the scholar understood the lesson.

As soon as luncheon was over, Milly relapsed into one of her reveries, and Daisy, perceiving her thus occupied, said, rather maliciously for such a good-natured person, "Has Mr. Fortescue been here this morning, cousin?"

Poor Milly fairly jumped at being thus addressed, and blushed, and stammered so, in her endeavour to appear unconcerned, that Jabez laughed outright.

"How ridiculous you are, Jabez!" said Milly. "Mr. Fortescue comes here to see you."

"See me! Come, that is a good 'un," replied Jabez. "Why, when I went up to London about my farm I met Mr. Fortescue at my lawyer's. He was civil enough when he heard what uncle had left me; but one day I see him in Hyde Park, lolling over the rails; and, being precious lonely for want of some one to speak to, I walked up to him and nods, but he cocked up his eye at the clouds, and never so much as said good-morning."

"Then why did you ask him here?" said Daisy.

"Always return good for evil. I see him leaning over a gate, yawning, and then whistlin', and then throwin' stones in the horse-pond—feeling, thinks I, just as I did in London. So I took compassion on him, and says, 'How do, Sir?' He didn't cock his eye up in the cloud then, I can tell ee; but nigh chuck my arm out of joint, he was so glad of a friend. What could I do but ask him home to a bit and a sup?"

"And we have made ourselves so agreeable that he has found occasion to repeat his visits five times in five days. Eh, Milly?" said Daisy, with a knowing look, which drove the blushing girl from the room.

Jabez had been married nearly twelve months, and during that period he had been Daisy's pupil, striving very diligently to acquire such knowledge as she could impart to him; and whilst they were thus engaged Mr. Fortescue was assiduous.

Mr. Fortescue was evidently a man about town, and, being now rusticating for reasons best known to himself, had selected Little Grabley as a covert less likely to be drawn by the Sheriff's pack than any other with which he was related. His introduction to Lacy Hall was therefore an opportunity to be improved, and he availed himself of it to the full, especially when he heard from one of the servants that Miss Milly was worth ever so many thousand pounds, and perfectly disengaged.

When Mr. Fortescue's metropolitan difficulties were arranged, the country became intolerable to him, and therefore he endeavoured to tempt the household of Lacy Hall to visit London, but was met with a flat refusal from Jabez.

"You must be more amenable, my dear Coulterson; you must indeed," said Fortescue. "Mrs. Coulterson and Miss Milly would produce a sensation in town."

Jabez expressed a very strong opinion on that point, and vowed "that he hated London, and that nothing on earth should take him there if he could help it;" declaring "that Rotterdam was the worst turn in his strawyard; and that it was all very well for those who had been reared among bricks and mortar, sniffing nothing but coal smoke, to like the hard paving-stones and stifling streets; but for him, who had rolled upon daisies until he was old enough to walk upon them, he'd have no more of London."

Miss Milly, of course, sided with Mr. Fortescue, saying that it was cruel to Daisy to be mewed up in the country all her life, and never know what real pleasure was; but Daisy came to her husband's aid, and declared that she was always happy—always; and if she ever had a momentary wish to visit London (which she remembered only as a child), she thought of all the good they had at home, and was contented.

Jabez rewarded her eloquence with such a hearty smack that it made Mr. Fortescue wink with the explosion.

When Mr. Fortescue returned to town he set his wicked wits to work to accomplish the object he had at heart—namely, to obtain possession of Miss Milly's little fortune. He was a thoroughly bad fellow, and perfectly unscrupulous wherever his interest appeared to be concerned. Having ascertained that Coulterson's lawyer, Mr. Winch, would be absent from London for a fortnight, at least, Fortescue sent a letter in that gentleman's name, therein requesting Jabez to come to London, as a difficulty had arisen about the transfer of some property, and an appeal must be made to a Master in Chancery. A clerk in Mr. Winch's office was paid to assist in this scheme, and to keep Jabez in play, should he bite and take the hook.

This letter came like a bombshell into Lacy Hall, as Jabez, among a number of good qualities, had rather a violent temper, and for some half hour or so he raved like a madman. He wouldn't go! They should bring Master Chancery down to Lacy Hall. He wouldn't go up to London so near Christmas time, when he had made up his mind to invite all his old neighbours and friends to a great feast on Christmas Eve. What did he pay a lawyer for? He wouldn't go, not he! But when Daisy told him that it was his duty to attend to his own business, adding, when that argument appeared to fail, "Now that we need go to London, Jabez, I don't mind confessing—though I have never said this before, because you were opposed to it—that I should like to see London again; and now that you know how much pleasure you will give your wife, you will not feel this business such a trouble, will you?"

"And you wish to go, Daisy? said Jabez, making a very lugubrious face, "to leave our dear little home, where we seemed never to want anything more than one another to be happy? Oh! how happy I ha' been, Daisy, thinkin' that you cared for nought that these four walls didn't hold, and that you was content to be the teacher, the guide, of the poor man who, tho' no scholard, yet learned to love you more than all the words contains. Oh, Daisy! I shall never feel that you long to live for somethin' more nor me—me who loves you so."

Daisy threw her arms round his neck, saying, "Jabez, dear Jabez, I cannot bear this, I cannot."

"Well, then, say you won't go. Say you don't wish to leave home, and you shall tired of our home—your husband."

Daisy took his hands and looked him tenderly in the face before she replied,

"When I married you, Jabez, it was not until after a long wooing. Folk thought it was your home and your money which made me yours at last. It was not so. I saw all the goodness of your heart, and loved you for it. Since we have been man and wife, what day has not made me love you more, my dear, good husband?"

"Then all's right again, dear Daisy," said John, rubbing his eyes with the knuckles of both hands.

"Yes; I will stay here whilst you go to London," replied Daisy; "for you must go, as the person who gives you this new trouble—not the postscript to Mr. Winch's letter—assails the fair fame of your mother."

"Says aught again my mother!' cried Jabez," snatching the letter, which had hitherto been read only by Daisy. "I'll make the fellow eat his words." And he began spelling the postscript, as Jabez was not a proficient in reading "written hand."

"That is enough," he continued. "Pack up, Daisy dear; we'll go at once. I don't fear London now, with its plays and operas, carriage folk and fine gentlemen. Cousin Milly, you'll go with us, won't ee? And Patty, too. Get ready to pack up well, Daisy."

Mrs. Coulterson was too anxious for Jabez to answer Mr. Winch's summons not to avail herself of this decision instantly, and Milly was so delighted that she clapped her hands and ran out of the room to communicate the intelligence to the journey. The day after the next Jabez, with a heavy heart, permitted himself to be driven from Lacy Hall, in company of his household, on his way to London.

Mr. Winch's absent clerk (to whom Jabez had been requested to address his reply) and Mr. Fortescue were at the station waiting to receive the Coultersons on their arrival in London, and this considerate attention was very gratifying to one of the party at least. Mrs. Fortescue had written to Mr. Winch (to be sail) of Mr. Coulterson's visit, and, knowing that he could not come alone, had ventured to engage (subject to approval) some apartments for them in the house of a person of respectability; and during the whole party proceeded Mr. Fortescue kindly accompanying them.

The rooms were gaily furnished, being rather tawdry than elegant; and there was a boldness about the landlady which would have been offensive in a more aristocratic locality; but which, as it was, Mr. Fortescue accepted it as best London manners and acknowledged their own inferiority. Mrs. Beauchamp let lodgings and dealt in left-off wardrobes of the society and gentry, giving the wives of actors her cast evening, and other dresses, laces, and jewellery. Mrs. Beauchamp and Mr. Fortescue had been acquainted for many, many years. The knowledge which they had of certain questionable proceedings connected with the latter rather made them what they termed bosom friends; and the Coultersons were therefore to be enmeshed for their mutual advantage, and in less than a week from the time of their arrival the spider's web was completed.

Mr. Winch's clerk had called on the day succeeding the arrival of the Coultersons in London to say that his principal had been most unexpectedly called to Jersey on business of the greatest importance, but his return to town should be instantly announced; and an order had been taken out "to stay proceedings." Poor innocent Jabez received this statement as truth; and, indeed, like many other nervous people, was rather glad to have his introduction to Master Chancery delayed.

Mr. Fortescue promised to prevent time hanging heavy on the hands of his country friends, and he therefore took them to the theatres and operas in the evenings and for pleasant drives in the mornings—at the expense of Jabez, of course. Miss Milly never thought of that, but believed Mr. Fortescue to be one of the kindest of friends, the most delightful of gentlemen. One afternoon the ladies pleaded fatigue as an excuse for remaining at home in the evening, and Mr. Fortescue therefore availed himself of the favourable opportunity of taking Jabez away to dinner. We have another space nor inclination to record how that evening was passed at Mr. Fortescue's chambers, in Lyon's Inn; but Jabez lay late in bed the next morning—long after Daisy and Milly had gone for a little shopping; and when he came to breakfast he complained of a little head-ache.

Patty guessed the cause of Jabez's incapacity to enjoy his breakfast, and shook her head when he looked up at her, very ruefully.

"Oh, Patty!" said Jabez, "I be very bad here, old gal, take Bashaw'd lobster and champagne for supper—never!"

"It's not likely I shall be asked," replied Patty; "I never takes only bread and cheese. Ah! Jabez, Sir, I shall be glad to get back again to the old home."

"And so shall I," said Jabez. "We've been here above a fortnight, and I'm sick on it. Mine's an early-to-bed constitution, and this here don't agree with it. Where's Daisy—Mrs. Coulterson?"

"She and Miss Milly 's gone out shopping," replied Patty. "They're going to this Christmas-tree party to-night at my Lady's."

"Oh, Lor'! I'd forgot that," said Jabez. "Mr. Fortescue hadn't asked me; but then he seemed to go, I couldn't say nay. It's a real lady's, Patty, and there's to be a Christmas-tree—something from Jarminy; and I've paid Mrs. Beauchamp's milliner a mint o' money for Prince of Wales's feathers for Daisy's head, and—and what's that stuff that sounds like a sneeze?—Tissue! tissue! that's it."

"Bless her!" continued Jabez, after a short pause, "she might eat gold if she could do it; but she don't seem to have the light heart she had, since she came to this Babylonish captivity, as Rector says."

"You're right, Jabez—Master, I mean," said Patty.

"No, call me Jabez. When I aint well I like to be spoke kind to," replied Mr. Coulterson.

"Well, then, Jabez," said Patty, leaning her two hands on the table, and speaking almost in a whisper, "I don't like the goings on in this house; I don't like Mrs. Beauchamp."

"Not she!" said Jabez, in surprise; "why, she's hand and glove with all the nobility and gentry in London."

"You mean she's secondhand," replied Patty, making her only attempt at a joke during a long life, "and with lady's-maids, not ladies. I picked up her card, read it."

Jabez did, to his utter confusion, and then exclaimed, "Why, if she aint been dressing out Daisy secondhand! That won't do."

"Hush, Jabez," said Patty, again whispering. "Don't keep quiet, and get away. Missus needn't know nothing till we gets back, and then we can all laugh together. Miss Milly and she has set their hearts on this Christmas-tree, so you must let 'em go; but you ha' done with that Mr. Fortescue, he means no good to you or any o' us women either."

Jabez jumped up and clenched his fist, but Patty stopped any ebullition of temper by laying her hand on his mouth and hurrying him into his bed-room, leaving him there, as Mr. Fortescue knocked at the door, according to his morning custom. Mrs. Beauchamp came with him into the room which Jabez had just quitted, saying, "The Coultersons are out, the ladies state home, and the gentleman just this moment, I fancy. You'll kill that poor fellow, Patty. You see what a sufferer he has been this morning," pointing to the breakfast-table.

Jabez, finding his shaving water cold, had opened his bed-room door with the intention of obtaining a fresh supply from the urn just as Mrs. Beauchamp made this reference to him; and as the two friends then sat down upon the sofa for a chat, Mr. Coulterson showed his normal want of manners by listening to what they said. Fortescue laughed, and said something about having bled the bumpkin pretty freely, and then he presented Mrs. Beauchamp with a crisp bank note, which that lady received without any hesitation.

From what Jabez could hear, Fortescue seemed to be praising Daisy's beauty and simplicity, and then some allusion was made to Milly. Again they spoke of Daisy; and then, Mrs. Beauchamp having mentioned some word which sounded to Jabez like Pullyglious Jabez made a short exclamation, which reached the ears of the speakers.

Mrs. Beauchamp having pointed with her thumb to the door of Jabez's room, the two friends rose and quietly withdrew.

Jabez got on very badly with his shaving, and, before he had quite finished that irritating operation, he sought a dictionary and looked up the word "poly-gamy."

The meaning of that terrible word set Jabez in a fever, and, half shaven and carelessly dressed, he went out into the street, without knowing why he did so.

"I begin to think there's some dreadful plot at work," thought Jabez, after a time. "Why did he mix up Daisy's name with that ugly word? Oh, if his villany could succeed it would make me a staring lunatic! No! I shouldn't feel nothing! Daisy's too good, too truehearted. But why should I let her be tempted? That's wrong o' me, downright wrong, and it shan't be. Lawyer or no lawyer, we goes back to Lacy Hall to-morrow."

He continued to ramble about for more than two hours, and when he returned Patty opened the door, her face so full of settled wonder that Jabez was frightened, his mind still occupied with Daisy.

"What's the matter, Patty? Missus aint out, will ee?" said Jabez.

"Oh, Jabez Coulterson!" said Patty, leaning against the wall, "I have just come from thy wife"——

"Well! Well!"

"And there she be, looking like the picter of a Queen upon her throne!"

"Be that all? You turned my blood to ice with your silly face,' said Jabez, going up stairs, followed by Patty.

"And so she's been trying on her finery, eh?" asked Jabez. "An she looks grand, do she? and beautiful in her fine feathers and di'monds? She'll not want them when we get home again, think ye, but be content wi' her pretty silk gowns and simple bonnets?"

"Oh, surely she will," replied Patty, as Daisy, dressed in a very elegant toilet from Mrs. Beauchamp's milliner, entered the room. She certainly looked very handsome, and her cheeks were much more rosy than usual, as Mrs. Beauchamp had offended her during the process of dressing by speaking somewhat disparagingly of Jabez, and hinting that the preceding evening had been spent at cards and the bottle. Mrs. Beauchamp had been nursing Mr. Fortescue's money. "If Mr. Coulterson," Daisy had said, "has been so misled as to be guilty of follies and vices to which he was until lately a stranger, his wife is the last person who should be told of them."

But her anger had vanished when she presented herself to the astonished Jabez, who sat gazing at her silently for some minutes.

"No word of admiration?" asked Daisy, at length. "Are you not pleased to see me?"

"Yes, yes—very pleased," replied Jabez.

"You little thought when you came courting the poor farmer's daughter that you would ever see her dressed as I am now, Jabez, and all by your bounty."

"Don't talk so, Daisy," said Jabez. "I pray o' you, don't. If all I've got could make you happy, I'd give it freely, but"——

"Surely you don't object to what I have done?" asked Daisy—have I done wrong?"

"No, no," answered Jabez, "but mine's such a greedy heart I can't bear thee to like aught I can't share. Go! have thy night of glory! You've a loving heart still, Daisy, that nothing can change, haven't you? Nothing can change?"

"Nothing!" replied Daisy, emphatically.

Jabez rose up, and kissed his pretty wife, who then left the room to disrobe until the evening.

Poor Jabez was sorely troubled by what he had overheard, and he thought over it until he concluded that Fortescue was a villain, that Mrs. Beauckamp was as bad as he, and that both had combined in some plot against the peace of Daisy and himself. He was not wrong.

Jabez therefore stole down stairs to Mrs. Beauchamp's room, and found the lady alone. Without waiting to be invited, he sat down at the table at which she had been writing, and said, bluntly,

"Mrs. Beauchamp, you be what's called a woman o' the world. Don't deny it, because I want you to be so. I am a new schoolard to the same school; but I've learned my few lessons thoroughly and well."

"What do you mean, Sir?" asked Mrs. Beauchamp.

"This—I've seen that most of the world is guided by lust o' pleasure and lust o' money."

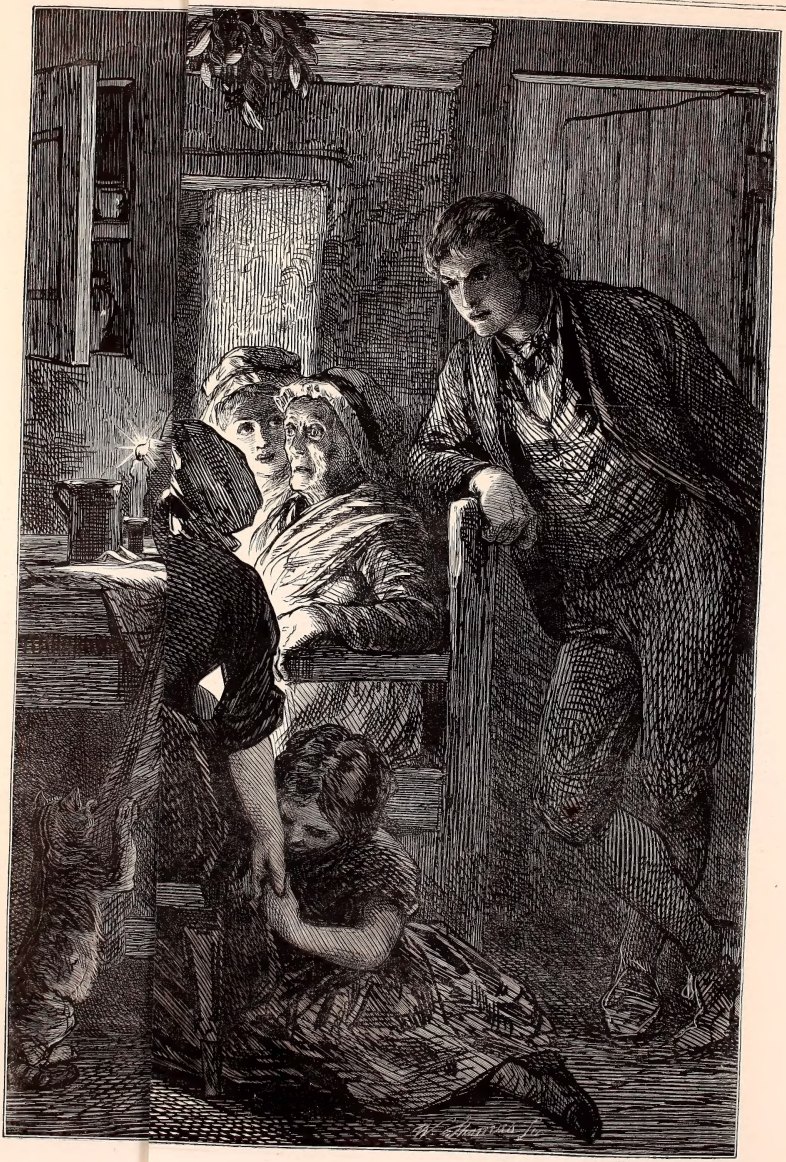
Mrs. Beauchamp bowed her head affirmatively.

"You like money; you've sold a good deal for money besides left-off wardrobes. Don't start so, I beant angry at that discovery, and won't taunt you wi' my bargain; but you've sold a little bit of your conscience now and then, and I want to buy some of the same commodity that you've sold Mr. Fortescue."

Mrs. Beauchamp was a cool card, and she nodded her head again.

"Time's short, so I'll be plain wi' you," said Jabez. "For his money you have undertook to do none 'us—say with Milly, or say wi' none one else. You see I guess pretty true, so your plot must fail."

"What plot, Sir?" asked Mrs. Beauchamp, very coolly.



"Now, no more secrets atwixt us," replied Jabez. "There's one hundred pounds; take it. Now hear what I say. He can't pay you to do them wrong as I will to save 'em. Make a clean breast to me, and I'll pay you more. What's he mean; what's he seeking?"

"Well, Mr. Coulterson," replied Mrs. Beauchamp, after a few moments' reflection, "you are so very liberal that I should be wrong not to answer you. I think—in fact I know—that Mr. Fortescue admires your ladies very much."

"What! both—both on 'em, perhaps?"

"Well, I fancy so; but Miss Grainger is in most danger," replied Mrs. Beauchamp, coolly, pleasantly, as though she were telling the young lady's fortune; "but, if you will undertake to make this one hundred two, I will prevent any injury."

"Houd up your hand," said Jabez, interrupting Mrs. Beauchamp; and then, striking his own against the hand of the lady, as though he were making a market bargain, he added, "Done! Bought and sold; and now to deliver!"

"Very well, I will take your word," said Mrs. Beauchamp. "Mr. Fortescue certainly admires Mrs. Coulterson, and for that reason, amongst others, he has led you into dissipation; but his design is to marry Miss Grainger, if he can obtain her money, and then desert her."

"The scoundrel!" cried Jabez.

"He is not scrupulous, certainly," said Mrs. B. "I fancy that Miss Grainger would be a consenting party; but Fortescue is married—a wretched match, made years ago; and his wife has been living away some years, under an arrangement, in Brussels. He would risk the discovery, as his fortunes at present are very desperate."

"Well; and Mrs. Coulterson?" asked Jabez.

"Oh! I think nothing of her flirtation with Fortescue," said Mrs. Beauchamp, artfully. "Pretty women know their influence, and use it."

"Yes, yes," said Jabez, gazing vacantly; "and she is pretty. Mrs. Beauchamp, I'll be as good as my word; oh, yes! and keep your secret, and better than my word too!" — He paused.

"I understand you, Sir," replied Mrs. Beauchamp, "and be sure I will be your friend."

Jabez thanked her, poor fellow! and then went out again, saying that he should dine abroad, as he was going once more to seek Mr. Winch, the long-absent lawyer.

Daisy and Milly were dressed for the party, and Jabez had not returned. Daisy was sitting alone in the drawing-room, when Fortescue was announced. He stood for a few moments in silent admiration, as it were, of the beautiful woman seated before him, and then, in the most respectful tone, said,

"How very beautiful you look! I could not have believed that dress would have improved you so much."

Daisy felt a strange alarm at this address, and when he at length proceeded to use still stronger phrases of admiration her woman's pride was aroused, and she rose to ring the bell. But Fortescue would have prevented her, but she looked at him defiantly and said,

"Sir; more than once lately you have addressed me in language the meaning of which I did not dare to suspect. You have now presumed to make your previous expressions intelligible. Be pleased to leave me;" and she rang the bell violently.

Fortescue tried to excuse what he had said, but Daisy refused to hear him or to see him again except in the presence of her husband, if he dare stay to meet Jabez.

Mr. Fortescue, abashed and confused, was obliged to leave the house, to the terrible consternation and disappointment of Milly, who would not believe Daisy's interpretation of her admirer's conduct, and she and her cousin parted angrily.

Daisy tore from her head the feathers, and shook her hair free of its bandages, as though her brain were oppressed by them, and then sat down and hid her face.

Jabez returned and entered the room.

"So the day's turned out showery, and there's thunder about," he thought; "Milly crying below, and Mrs. Beauchamp looks like a fiery furnace. 'Well, Daisy,' he said, aloud.

"Oh, Jabez, my dear, dear husband!" cried Daisy, running to him and embracing him passionately.

"What! there's been in the wars, I see," said Jabez, in a strange, cold voice. "I heard somewhat of it down stairs. It's all as well that disappointments and troubles should come by degrees. You've had yours; I've had mine."

"Oh! nothing serious I hope, dear Jabez?"

"That's as may be, thanks to your friend Mr. Fortescue," replied Jabez. "I've found out the plot some o' you had to get me up to London."

"Plot?" asked Daisy. "I in a plot?"

"I said some o' ye. Mr. Fortescue, perhaps—perhaps Milly. Mr. Winch never wanted me. It's all a trick to get me here. Well, here I am."

"Jabez, you frighten me," said Daisy. "Your manner, tone, look—all are changed. What has happened?"

"They've been making a fine gentleman o' me," replied Jabez, sternly; "takin' me to a gamin' house—giving me wine, and what not; and I've lost my money. There be many wicked things done in this great city. Why shouldn't I ha' my part? You would come to London, all o' ye, tho' I warned you what would happen."

"Oh, Jabez, Jabez!" said Daisy, "you are conceding something from me. What is it? What has happened? Let us go home tomorrow!"

"You can—you can, if so please you," replied Jabez. "I don't go till I've had my revenge, or till I've assuaged it right out."

"Oh, Jabez! What are you saying?"

"But not you, Daisy. I cared for that when I made you my wife. You can live like a lady, no matter what comes o' me."

"What have you said, Jabez; what have you said!" cried Daisy, the tears falling fast, "the only unkind words you ever spoke to me. Leave you. Leave you if you were ruined? Oh, how cruel!"

"Cruel!" Jabez paused. "Then you—then Mr. Fortescue—he could not, he dared not say more.

Daisy flushed very red as she replied, "Mr. Fortescue is a villain. He has dared to address me"——

Jabez stopped her by taking both her hands and looking her in the face. He only looked a few moments and then pressed her to his bosom. "I know how you answered him, my wife—my true wife!"

Daisy, when composed enough, told Jabez all she had heard, and then Milly was summoned; but she still contended that Daisy had misunderstood Fortescue, and confessed that he had addressed herself as a suitor.

"Poor child!" said Jabez. "If you care for him I am sorry, Milly. You shall have the truth out o' him. Write him a note and ask him to see you in the morning—here, alone like." And after some further discussion a note was written and sent to Fortescue.

The next morning Jabez was in great good spirits, and one or two sly looks passed between him and Patty, much to Daisy's wonder.

It was arranged that Milly should receive Fortescue alone at first; but scarcely had that person been introduced when Jabez and Daisy joined the party. Fortescue started and said, "I understood, Miss Grainger, that you desired to see me alone!"

"You must excuse what I have done," said Milly, "but I have brought you here for your own sake—to remove from my cousin's mind that"——

Jabez couldn't keep quiet—"That you're a bad man—a scoundrel, in fact. You have addressed Cousin Milly as a suitor—a regular, honourable suitor."

"I have. Why should I not?" asked Fortescue, boldly.

"Because the law o' England won't let a man marry two women, both on 'em alive. Yes 'ee a wife already."

Fortescue fairly staggered at this assertion, and watched with intense interest Jabez proceed to the adjoining room, whence he let forth a trembling woman, closely veiled, and who would have fallen had not Jabez placed her in a chair.

"This lady calls herself Mrs. Fortescue," said Jabez. But the confounded trickster could not conceal his own secret, and Fortescue exclaimed,

"My wife in England! Woman, you shall repent this violation of our contract." And, repeating this declaration with the addition of an oath, he left the house.

Poor Milly was terribly distressed; but Daisy strove to comfort her by congratulating her on the escape she had had from such a wicked man.

"Well," said Jabez, "I think we have had enough o' London for some time, and an't drawed many prizes off Lady Thingamee's Christmas-tree, so we 'll home, all on us, and this poor critter shall make one of our party."

Daisy was astonished at this proposition, but ceased to be so when Jabez pulled off the veil and discovered old Patty.

"So you are," said Jabez, "there's not much harm done, after all," laughing heartily.

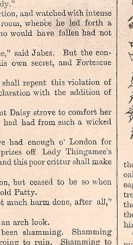
"But your losses?" said Daisy, with an arch look.

"Not a fiss-bite, Issy. I've only been shamming. Shamming to lose my fortune. Shamming about going to ruin. Shamming to have found Mrs. Fortescue."

"And the drinking?" said Daisy, shaking her head and smiling.

"Well, there war a little truth in that; but, once home at Lucy Hall, I'll do—what do they call is?—penance; but not till Christmas-tide is over, for we 'll have a frolic when we get back."

And Jabez kept his word, and Lucy Hall's holly-berries sparkled in every window of Lucy Hall, and in the barn where old friends and neighbours had been invited to make merry. Jabez had reared a Christmas tree, upon every bough of which some substantial prize of good worsted-work, or packets of tea or tobacco, and not one of them without a bright half-crown hidden within; in gratitude, so Jabez and Daisy said, that they had gathered from the London Christmas-tree nothing which they had carried home with any lasting regret.



A GHOST STORY.

WE have not yet done with the fund old popular belief in occasional apparitions of the persons of the dead visible to the eyes of the living. This relic of Paganism still lingers, especially in the nooks and corners of country neighbourhoods. It is a more serious matter to many a simple folk than the bolder practice of spiritualism, to those who have lately indulged in that fashionable pastime. Some ghost stories are honestly believed, though some are invented for the purpose of astonishing and frightening the weak, for the thew, or perhaps for the fun-room fireside, or, better still, at the family hearth, for their rude labours of the day.

The humorous scene, designed by Mr. George Thomas, which occupies, in the large Engraving, the two middle pages of this Supplement, sufficiently explains itself. The wide, old-fashioned chimneyplace of this homely cottage is decked with holly and mistletoe, which were broken in festive evening of the Christmas season. The company, as it should be at this time, which is hallowed by the domestic charities, seems to include the kindred of three generations, from the cosy grandsire and his aged partner, with the portsin and daughter on the other side, to the little child that comes upon the floor, and clings, in delicious terror, to her sister's arm. The queer fellow, whose narrative eloquence has engaged the rapt attention of the whole circle, is a privileged character, who will step dignity in the sole arm-chair, while he repays the household for the welcome bestowed on him by giving them one of the most marvellous stories ever heard. If we may guess the character of his favourite of him who was boiled, hovering in the steam and smoke of the chimney, with a plaintive remonstrance against his untimely fate. Or it may be an orgie of fiends and witches dancing round a diabolical revel about a bonfire kindled with their broken bones, and preparing for the mystic sanctification of a malignant soul but recently escaped from its fleshly body. Old Bogeyism, in some one of its diverse shapes of laziness and fun, is the burden of this ghostly narrative, uttered by the rustic trouvere with such face-making and waving of the arms as must hugely enhance its sensational effect. The old man smoking his pipe in the corner seems to be the least affected of the party. The old woman, with an abstracted look, is musing, perhaps, on some of her old experiences which the story may have brought to her mind. The younger women are seriously alarmed; not so the young man who leans upon the arm of his settle, and regards, with mingled distrust and admiration, the visitor whose wonderful talk is fanned all over the country. At the opposite side of the fireplace, in snug seclusion behind the frightened mistress of the cottage, is a withered elder, whose face is strongly expressive of incredulity and contempt. Under the table, at the left-hand corner of our Engraving, we see a playful cat tugging at the cloth on which a jug of beer and lighted candle are resting, whence it may be expected that a horrid crash and sudden darkness will presently attend the catastrophe of the Ghost Story.

HOLLY, IVY, AND MISTLETOE.

BY THOMAS MILLER.

ONG before that remote period when "the trees went forth to anoint a King over them,"* the leaves talked to one another; and we still hear faint syllables of that undated language finding utterance when they whisper to the wind.

"I remember a time," said the Ivy, "when I had nothing to cling to but the rocks and trees; for then the grey ruins of Stonehenge lay unhewn in the quarry; nor had man left the imprint of his foot on this island, whose I still grow."

"I then threw a green shadow over the gnarled crab-trees," said the Mistletoe, "when the winter had stripped all the topmost branches of those aged forest trees before he made a sweep at the spotted fawn that trotted beside the doe in the green and open glade. The hunter—man—had not then penetrated those primeval thickets to slay and afterwards clothe himself in skins of the beasts of the chase."

"I remember looking down from the tall elms I had enringed when man first appeared," said the Ivy, "with his hatchet of stone in his skin belt and his flint-headed spear in his hand. He peered out of the caverns, and ate the wild forest berries when the chase fell not into the rude pit he had dug to supply him with a meal."

"Then he bowed (ages) of his own making, and in his ignorance worshipped me," said the Mistletoe; "for no Christmas bells had as yet sent their silvery sound over our island shore, or rung out their glad Gospel-tidings to man."

"The grey stone altar often stood in the gloomy forest depths where I grew," said the Holly, "and I have seen it bluish with human blood as scarlet as my own berries, when stained with the horrid Druidical sacrifice. Then the human hair (worn by the priest) and man, has many a time bled there, and sent up shrieks to Heaven that have scared the wolf of the wold as he lay in his den, gnawing the relic of some former victim."

"I twined about the hut in the forest fastness that was the home of her the savage Druids sacrificed," said the Ivy, "and heard the first vows of love the young hunter whispered in her ear. The wild roses bloomed all around it in summer, and sweet-scented honeysuckle with crimson scented the forest air. Where my bright leaves played over her beautiful brow she loved to sit and await the return of her lover in the autumn eve. Her hair twined with spirited hands and eyes raised towards Heaven, and heard the cry of the doomed one as the bearded priest clutched her long hair and twined it savagely round his hand while he cut through her white neck with the sacrificial knife."

"With the stained blade did they sever my branches," said the Mistletoe, "on the sixth day of the moon, while the priests held up their white garments in which they caught the berried sprays before they fell to the ground, for I was held contaminated if I touched the earth, in which I never take root; and even to the Druids it was a mystery how I grew. The Romans came, and burnt many a grove where I waved and was nourished, and overthrew many a temple in which my green-golden berries had spottered in the flames. But now I keep count of the number of kisses that are given beneath my branches, and look down on the rosy lips that pout if they remain unpressed until the end of merry Christmas."

"I, too, have seen many a change," said the Holly, "since first the Roman eagle bristled against my scarlet berries and the armed legions marched along the road they had cleared in the forest to attack some British town. Before the light of that star which was 'rising in the East' had reached these wave-washed shores the temples of the heathen goddess were more than half-ruinous; for instead of the grim idols they bowed to, forms beautiful enough for gods enamoured and stood between the pillared porches."

"I twined around the pointed spear of Mars," said the Ivy, "and waved my green leaves over the bluebells Jupiter gazed into; the marble brow of Diana I garlanded, and hung my dark berries on her moon-shaped tiara. Then the human form was worshipped, and such shapes sculptured from the quarries as have never been excelled for beauty. But though man had made a vast advance from the wicker idols of the painted Britons, he had not yet knelt to the true Divinity. Many a year was there, but they had waved down; while Love and Mercy sat, hand in hand, in silence, with their cold fingers on their lips, listening to the sound of the gospel trumpet which had not yet blown over the sea, but which ere long shook the Roman gods from their pedestals."

"But they were the pioneers of civilisation," replied the Mistletoe. "They found our island covered with long leagues of dark forests, the growth of centuries, the valleys and hollows filled with pools of mere, where the wildfowl preened themselves; spongy bogs and reedy wastes bordered the impassable marsh; for such was the England the Roman invaders found. They left the sunshine, making golden pathways through the openings of the forests they cleared; flocks and herds bleating and lowing where the river-like meres rocked the bordering sedge with their ripples, while fruitful orchards waved their red and white blossoms in spring on spots which the reedy wastes had before covered; and on the sunny slopes, where the wild deer basked amid gorse, fern, and purple heather, they left the husky rustle of the brown harvest, ready for the granaries they had built. They also made roads, which on an after day were trodden and by generations of Christians, and along which the sound of Christmas bells came and went as it was borne near to or far off by the breeze; and along those town highways the dead were carried me in their arms to decorate their churches and houses during that holy season. Where the Roman legions had marched they left the imprint of their little footsteps in the snow when laden with holly, ivy, and mistletoe."

"I remember those changes well," said the Holly, "and how the sunsets which had for centuries only gilded the tops of tall forest-trees flashed back the golden fanes of walled cities, and how the listening silence that reigned for weary miles over the untrodden landscape was broken by the hum of human voices. Then came strange, sweet sounds, such as on an after day I heard hail and then chanted by angels to shepherds who watched their flocks by the light of the stars in the far-away fields of Bethlehem—sounds so strange and holy that they caused the Roman sentinel, as he paced to and fro along the battlement, to pause in his measured march, while he leant with bowed head upon his spear to listen to the "glad tidings of great joy, and peace and goodwill toward men," which was slowly spreading every way over the earth. Men already saw the form of the cross in the stars."

"I saw the first Christian soldiers that marched under the Roman eagles," said the Ivy. "There were greyhaired men amongst them who knew those that had looked on the meek countenance of the Redeemer, and had talked with the Centurion who stood at the foot of the cross and exclaimed, 'This was a righteous man!' I have listened to them while the flame of their camp-fires reddened my leaves, and heard them tell how they stood sentinels in the Roman halls when Paul was led in a captive. I heard the loud hallelujah chanted by those who followed Germanus, and listened to the songs of Zion hymned by Claudia on the very spot where a Druidical altar then stood. Her sweet voice chanted the first Christmas carols which were ever sung to celebrate the holy advent in this island."

"Then I rest from the British ideals," said the Mistletoe; "and, instead of garlanding the circles of Druid stones, I was used in the decoration of Christian temples where rites had been performed to the Roman gods; felt centuries passed away before these were wholly hurled down and the White Dove of Pence was seen to hover above the altars amid rays of golden glory."

"That was before the lovely Saxon churches were erected," replied the Holly, "or my crimson berries twined around the wooden pillars that supported the thatched roofs under which they assembled in the grey winter dawning to celebrate the day when the Saviour of Mankind was born of a Virgin in a lowly manger. I threw out my armed green leaves along the waysides when Augustin, followed by his monks, first landed on this happy island. They bore neither sword, spear, nor shield, but held high up the sacred cross, the emblem of love and peace, under which they marched to a bloodless victory. On the banner which they carried was emblazoned the form of the dying Redeemer, and they chanted the sacred Litany as they moved slowly and gravely along."

"I was waving in the wind from the grey rocks when they landed," said the Ivy, "and saw them kneel down and offer up a prayer on the beach. Many a misbelieving Saxon who worshipped Thor and Woden was there. I saw women and children peeping from under the arms of the soldiers who were drawn up along the wayside, gazing with pitying eyes on the crucified figure which the banner displayed."

"England was then changed," said the Holly; "for, when it became a custom to gather us as decorations for Christian festivals—and neither a church, hall, nor hut was deemed considered complete unless the walls were garlanded with evergreen—then it was that the flowers and all Nature's works began to attract attention, and a love was shown towards everything beautiful, which has gradually grown up to what it is now."

"That growth we alone have witnessed," said the Holly, "though no change has taken place in us. From age to age my blossoms in summer and hung out my scarlet berries in winter, as I do now. The flowers of spring faded and died, and all trees but us hung like mourners over the dead leaves which autumn scattered at their feet. The speckled lark soared as high and sang as sweetly as ever in the sunshine of June, and the robin alighted on my branches in winter to compare the colour of his breast with my scarlet berries, and to peck a few of the ripest to deepen the dye."

"In the silence of those dull forests long since felled, and where I once grew, lovers went a-maying," said the Mistletoe. "They stood mute in the moonlight encircling one another while they listened to the song of the nightingale. Where trunks of trees now stretch and the smoke of a thousand homes arises, many a path, bordered with wild flowers and overhung with branches, has wound; and there the vows of love were whispered for centuries."

"I waved over the grey church porch when they entered," replied the Ivy, "and saw the dull freestone made bright through the white flash of bridal garments. There I also hung when that funeral train passed beneath me, and the dull service over a deeper gloom from the sable garments of the mourners, while never more did the long aisle ring to that silver voice caroling like a bird these quaint old ditties which the simple villagers believed to be those chanted by the angels to the shepherds who watched their flocks by night. For men now began to look into the perilous eyes of woman with a devotion like that with which they might look upward upon the open gates of heaven, and mourned over them as much as when they were closed."

"Children as soon as they could lisp were taught those old Christmas carols," said the Holly; "and the beautiful young mothers, folding their clasped hands within their own, bent over them as they knelt in the evening firelight, before they retired to rest, as they prayed to the manger-born God-child and the Virgin Mother to protect and bless them. The unlettered hind learnt them from the Waits, who chanted them in the Christmas starlight; and they cheered his labour as he carolled them while ploughing the stubborn glebe. The red-armed country maiden felt purer and better while humming them as she milked her cows; and the woodman felt the solitude of the forest less lonely, as they supplied thoughts which became his companions and made him feel that God's protecting eye was over everywhere; while, anchored by the shore of the surrounding sea, the sailor heard the sweet peal of the Christmas bells above the murmur of the deep, and his thoughts turned to Him who rules the stormy waves in safety, when the cry of "Save me, or I perish!" arose. The sentry, pacing his lonely round, timed his footsteps to the Christmas chants; and, though far away, was joining them in the 'inward eye,' the grey old font and the village church wreathed with evergreen. Old Age listened with closed eyes, and through the rosy morning of memory saw those he had loved when young, and whom he had wept and mourned over, appear as they were—clouds of heaven to welcome his coming. For they filled the land with visions of angels, and when they saw strange footsteps in the Christmas snow believed that there the heavenly visitants had alighted."

"England was merry England then," said the Holly, and a joyous flush blushed through all his berries; "from the Court to the cottage all was merriment, for Christmas sat down and feasted everywhere; while the king banqueted in his palace, the baron held a feast in his old baronial hall, the wealthy squire threw open the doors of his ancient manor-house, and even at the wayside hostel the wayfarer was welcome, though a stranger, for we garlanded the porch, and the pretty hostess stood under the spirit-stirring branch, old Mistletoe, ready to give or receive the kiss of peace oftener than mine host thought was necessary, especially if the travellers who alighted were young and handsome.

"Even for the hungry and ragged beggarman a seat was found under the huge chimney, where there was room enough at times for a dozen to assemble; and, as he rubbed his thin hands with delight, and listened to the crackling of the huge logs, he saw the baron of beef sputtering before the fire, and heard the plum-pudding "wobbling" in the large porridge pot, where it was boiling long before daybreak. The very turnspit in the wheel gave a joyous bark every now and then (though it was hard work turning that enormous joint), as if it delighted that even he was helping to prepare the feast for Christmas."

"They hung me up in sly, shadowy corners," said the Mistletoe, "and over doors that opened into darkened passages, which the maidens had to pass; nay, even hid me under their jerkin, so that I might touch a rosy lip unperceived I was ready to be plucked at a moment to give my sanction to the pleasant wickedness. And, by some strange accident, the maidens were continually passing where I was present, and the youths stumbling against them. What myriads of berries had I have lost at this joyous season! For one was to be plucked at every kiss that was given, and strange devices had the laughing maidens for again fastening them to my branches after they had all been kissed away."

"From the tall church towers which I covered and from which I looked out over the country, and the merry bells of which shook the birds from my thick leaves, the clusters of evergreen leaves, I sent a message to worship," said the Ivy, "along footpaths that went winding over many a field; and by many a hill and woodside they approached, leaving dark lines in the snow over which they passed, and sending their merry voices before them as they came along; for it was a time of rejoicing throughout the length and breadth of the land, and grave Religion wore a sweet smile on that holy day. The sarvou of good things, which were preparing for them against service was over, thanksgiving through the frosty air to where I hung; and thoughts of the sappy goose and browned sirloin, plum-pudding, mince-pies, and a hundred other Christmas dishes mingled with their devotion. It was no day of mere penance; and if the prayers ascended more heavily through the steaming air, the bending ear of Heaven came nearer the earth to receive them, knowing that they sprang from hearts elated and grateful. Never, perhaps, was there a more joyous contrite. Even the grave divine from the pulpit bade them make merry at that joyous season, and after he left church stirred the great wassail bowl and regaled them all in person; while the fire of the flames from the huge yule-log went roaring up the wide chimney, and my leaves were often shrivelled through the heat from so many blazing fires."

"Though only seen by the 'inward eye,' jolly Old Father Christmas was a familiar presence," said the Holly. "He had a broad, red, merry face, large as a full moon; and though his hair was white over-head, and fringed it, and there were rents in his mince-pie and droppings from the wassail-bowl on his long silver beard, while the hair on his upper lip was masked with the foam of the spiced ale tankard, from which he took such a draught that he left the ale tankard, from which he took such a draught that he left the cake and elder wine, while the children filled his great hands with the dry nuts they had gathered in woods during ripe autumn, and which they had stored up against his coming."

"And also with the young men and merry maidens went forth to gather us," said the Mistletoe, "their joyous spirits causing the blood to run warm through their youthful veins, and bidding defiance to the cold. It was the lovely hours also of courtship, when, clear old Holly, with cheeks as ruddy as thy berries, through health and exercise, while they stood with widespread kirtles to catch the topmost sprays, which were the most beautiful berries, which their youthful lovers threw down! Nor heeded those hardy maidens the winter wind, which blew their loose tresses about, as it did the twigs of the ash, ancient Ivy; and sometimes the snow covered their clothes, and lodged in their hair, and sometimes about which little hooded cowls crept to wandering hearts, and sometimes my golden-shaded berries fell inside their bodices, as they stood under me with uplifted arms, as if to reach more towards the sky, and bent the slender boughs on which I grew at the point of their little feet on the ground, and to recall the beautiful faces that assembled there even days after they had departed. And I always found that young green leaf with a low wail from its scarcely-formed flowers, dewpearl-coloured blue-bells, and fairest lilies-of-the-valley in the places where their feet had trodden."

"We grow in that garden where the angels walked and looked on the tree of life," said the Holly, "and where the Lord Jesus first had his eyes opened; and we saw the first spirit in the air that was liberated from its prison-house of flesh, as we did that of the last infant that went away with a low wail from its scarcely-formed flowers, even while the tone was still in our ears from the millions like it who never have sinned, and whose voices ever arise from the glory that surrounds the throne; and we watched by Him who was once a babe in the manger, and who bears the marks of the Crucifixion about Him now that he is once more clothed."

"When coming centuries are dead," said the Ivy, "and living generations have been swept away and forgotten, we shall still wave as green and freshly as we do now in the sunshine and in the snow of winter."

When 'The sons of God saw the daughters of men that they were fair, and took them wives of all which they chose,' * and for them gave up the starry abodes of heaven—even for them willingly left the green leaves and berried branches, to sway in the winter wind and flower in the summer sunshine, and were looked upon and admired by such eyes as earth had never since seen; for the eyes of mortals of the green leaves and beautiful flowers, whom they allured to earth, even while they were keeping watch on the golden battlements of heaven. We were growing in old forests and along wild waysides, and I was growing over the porch of a cave ages ago when forgotten long before the prophet Isaiah foretold that in coming centuries a Child would be born who would be called 'The Prince of Peace,' whose birth would be heralded by coming to proclaim the first Christmas that had gladdened the earth since the creation of man. We remember looking up in wonderment at the new star which rose in the East, shining with so pure and silvery a light that beside it Mars showed like the crimson berries, old Holly, amid the snow. Neither before nor since has a star shimmered so beautifully, while its light was as soft as that which beamed from the blue eyes of a golden-haired infant, and many believed that it was His all-seeing eye looking out of heaven, as it did when 'the earth was without form and void, and darkness was upon the face of the deep.' Hymns of fairs were uptuned on that ever-blessed night to watch that new star moving up the sky; and when it stopped suddenly in its course, though we knew not then 'It stood over where the young child was,' sounds as of strange, sweet, holy music came floating high up in the air, from over the sea, at the very moment the star stood still; and we knew that the gates of heaven had opened, for such music belonged not to earth. Nor can these blessed sounds ever die away or return whence they came: they are heard, in turn, in every moving planet that rolls in the immensity of space; but to no one do they sound so sweetly or approach so near as to the earth, when they ring out, as of old, 'The holy time of Christmas has come again! Let the earth rejoice, and all within it sing songs of praise.'"

THE HAPPY CHRISTMAS AT FREDENSVIK.

CHAPTER I.

It had long been determined that Adolf and Selma should have a beautiful Christmas last year, and it is of that Christmas that I am going to tell you; but neither they nor their parents had any idea of what a wonderful time it really would prove to be.

Selma could remember three Christmases in her short life. The earlier ones remained in her memory like something in fairyland, where the dolls were little princesses, and boxes and bells inside them, and pretty little dogs, and cats, and lambs stood on little green carriages which she drew about. All Christmases she supposed to be like them, and looked forward to them with the same expectation of pleasure.

They lived in Goldenthal then, and the silberne Brunnen bubbled up near their own door; yet, though Adolf was called a goldener Junge, or golden lad, and Selma a goldene Magdelen, or golden girl, neither they were nor the children of rich people. Their father was the young pastor of Goldenthal; and before the third Christmas came, which were to live imperishably in the memory of both children, they were obliged to leave that pleasant home, and the beginning of a writerly December begin a long, long journey northward, to the shores of the stormy and now-freezing Baltic, and across to the Island of Ruegen, which was henceforth to be their home.

So now, in this cold December, they travelled slowly and sorrowfully—the young Pastor Lagenvall, and his delicate wife and their two little children—from one town to another in the cold and comfortless winter; through mournful intervening country, over vast, interminable stretches of dismal heath, snow-covered and bound in icy chains, across which the sullen winds blew; or through solitary black pine or birch forests, looking for the night in many melancholy villages or at dreary wayside inns. How weary a journey it was I cannot tell you, for the dear, good parents, the best and dearest parents that ever children had, were silent and sad, as if some great trouble brooded over them.

And so Christmas Eve came as they were housed in a poor little werthshaus, or inn, on a cold, ice-bound moorland, approached on the shores of the Baltic by a long, long road, also even in the cold covering of snow to veil and soften its desolate features. Here they had suddenly been stopped in their journey.

Nobody but a Swedish Christmas merriment just then, I can assure you; and the children only knew that it was the great festival time by having porridge with currants in it, and by their father reading to them the story, nearly two thousand years old, about the birth of Jesus Christ in a stable. Their parents like themselves, for whom a lodging could not be found in the inn, and which was therefore cradled in the manger with the oxen. That was the story which he read to them that Christmas Eve, and it seemed to have a strange reality even to little Selma. For they, too, were travelling on a long journey, and that same night a little child was born to them in that poor werthshaus, where there was but one small accommodation.

There were other guests in the little inn besides themselves, but none of them kept Christmas. There was the fat Countess, who, with her fat poodle and her fat Mamsell, was travelling from the Island of Rugen, where she lived, to join the Christmas festivities of her friend the Grand Duchess, who had here been detained a whole day owing to her coach breaking down, and would not be able to set off again till the next morning at daybreak. There was the humour of some merry-making. There were two three students also from Greifswald, who, under ordinary circumstances, would have made the little place alive with their fun and have loved nothing better than to have had the house full of guests besides themselves. But two of them were in attendance on the third, who was just recovering from smallpox, so that everybody was afraid of them, and they were obliged to keep in a room by themselves, not venturing even to say a kind word to the little children. Thus even they had not a very cheerful time of it, sitting in a back parlour with their hot stove, and smoking their long pipes all day, waiting for the steamer which would take them across into Zealand, where, for some reason or other, they were going.

The host and hostess, you would say, might have had some sort of merrymaking for their juvenile guests if not for themselves; and so they would, but for the fact that their daughter had been born, that was a very lively woman, and thought nothing of trouble; but she was gone to see a rich uncle, who was ill. Therefore the Christmas here was very dull, as I have said, for Adolf and Selma and their parents. Other than that day better than any other except the porridge with the currants in it, and the lovely story of the little child who was born in Bethlehem nearly two thousand years ago. Of course they knew that story of old, but it was impressed upon their hearts, as never before, because, as I said, a little child was born to them that same night—a little brother, amidst worldly circumstances perhaps still more discouraging than those of Joseph and Mary.

If, therefore, the children had not the merrymaking they had the little brother, and that they thought a good and great gift beyond all others was that Christmas Eve. Nothing in the whole world was of short duration. He was a little winter frost-flower, that faded out of life as if at the first warm breath of love. The great snow-flakes had gone out in the night of his birth, and covered the vast black plain; and beneath the snow-covering, and within the icy boom of a small neighbouring churchyard, the little human blossom was laid to moulder into its earthly elements.

Such was the third Christmas which Selma here distinctly in her memory, and we shall see presently what happened to make the next, the Christmas of only last year, so very remarkable. But before I can tell you, I have yet a few more words to say.

The mother of Adolf and Selma was a noble lady, the daughter of Baron Stolzenfeld, a proud man of an immensely long descent from home happier than it could be with her father, who thought of nothing but marrying her to a rich man.

Instead of waiting, however, to have this done for her, she married a young man named Lagenvall, the pastor of an adjoining parish, who was rich in nothing but his good qualities, and noble only by nature, which, after all, is the best nobility. In fact, she did exactly what the young lady in Tennyson's new poem of "Aylmer's Field" wished to do—she married a very good man, who loved her dearly, and to whom she was warmly attached.

This, of course, displeased her father, and he vowed that he would never see her face again, and that her husband and children should never have any of his money. For several years he acted according to this unkind and unchristian vow; and it was, everybody believed, owing to him that they were now obliged to leave their pleasant home in Goldenthal when the children were born, and where they would have been perfectly happy if he only would have been reconciled to them.

It was a sorrowful day in Goldenthal when they left, for they were beloved by the poor, and did so much good amongst them, that everybody sorrowed after them as after their best friends. No less sad was it to the good young Pastor and his wife. But they were forced to submit; and now we see them on their winter journey to the Island of Rugen, whither they were invited by the present aged pastor of the parish of Fredenvik, who, knowing the good character of his young clerical brother, wished him to become his curate or co-minister. It was but a very poor prospect for them in a worldly point of view. But no matter for that. The good young Pastor and his wife were thankful for this unexpected offer of a house and a large sphere of usefulness, where but for this they would have had no place to call their own.

After this long preamble, let us return to the poor inn whence the fat Countess, the fat Mamsell, and the still fatter postboy have just set out in the great coach. Before she drives away, however, I must tell you that, hearing from the Mamsell of the event of the night, she herself gave to the rosy-cheeked Pastor Lagenvall's wife that very pretty children are sitting at breakfast and offers her good wishes—for you never saw such a fat or such a good countess as she was in your life—and she regrets that she did not know who was in the inn last night, or she would have had the children up in her room, and they should have had Christmas games; as it is, they shall have some bonbons, of which she always carried a few boxes with her to be ready for such occasions. With that the fat, good-tempered Mamsell, who always attended her lady, went and fetched the prettiest and largest box you ever saw; and, whilst she and the children were looking at it and its contents, the Countess was talking with the Pastor about the old home and parish of Goldenthal, which he knew so well. Oh yes; and she knew Baron Stolzenfeld, and had heard of his daughter's marriage; and the Grand Duchess, her friend, had private property near Goldenthal, and she should not wonder if she were there before her return to her home in the Island of Rugen. And very glad she was, too, to find who the co-minister of Fredenvik was to be, for she lived herself near Fredenvik; and she hoped to find them all comfortably settled down, happier still than at Goldenthal, when she returned in the early spring, after her visit to the Grand Duchess.

All this was very cheering and pleasant; and when the great coach rolled away, with all its fat people inside, Pastor Lagenvall stood outside the door to wish the Countess a good journey, and then went into the chamber to his wife to tell her the event of the morning, and the two children admired and tasted their bonbons.

CHAPTER II.

And now we come to the great Christmas—the first Christmas at Fredenvik—which was only this time last year. It was to be a very merry Christmas, for the old Pastor loved to see people happy, and, above all, children; and he was now so comfortable in himself, with the young co-minister and his wife, that he thought he could not better express his gratitude to God than by trying to make everybody happy around him. He gave, therefore, the most unlimited orders to his old housekeeper to make great preparations, and it would be the most joyful Christmas that was ever kept at the old parsonage, because the young Pastor lived with the old, who had become quite a father to him and his wife.

It was but little that the young Pastor's wife could do in the great preparations, because another little son had been born at the beginning of autumn; and all that was now required of her was that she should take good care of herself and the dear little baby—which the children thought the most beautiful baby-angel that ever came from heaven—so that she might be able to sit in the midst of the show and enjoy all the good things that the Christ-child was bringing.

There was, as I have said, wonderful preparation going forward—very wonderful. I assure you I nevertheless, all this preparation of eating and drinking, and setting the house in order, as if for some great and unusual occasion, has reference to something far more important than either Pastor Lagenvall or his wife imagined. Nobody, in fact, really knew what it all meant, except the old Pastor and the Countess; for it was a great secret. I will tell you, however, that you may the better understand how much joy was really preparing for our friends.

You must understand, therefore, that the good Countess paid a visit with the Grand Duchess to her estate near Goldenthal, and there she learned a great deal more about Pastor Lagenvall and his wife than he was likely to tell her. When she came back in the early spring and heard him preach in the church at Fredenvik, and saw his earnest desire to fulfil all his duties as the guide and friend of the parish, in short, how he endeavoured to walk in the steps of his Great Master, Christ; and when, too, she saw what a beautiful character was that of his wife—how full of love, and gentleness, and pity—what a good wife and mother she was, and altogether such a lovely example to all the women of the district, she determined never to rest till she had induced the Baron Stolzenfeld to overcome his pride and his hardness of heart and take his daughter again into his affections and receive with her all the riches that she would bring—her husband and her children—which were worth a very great deal more than all his money and all his rank.

In her younger days, when the Countess was a Lady in Waiting at the Court of the Grand Duchess, Baron Stolzenfeld was one of the Grand Duke's gentlemen, and they were very good friends. But she now had not seen him for many years. However, she and the Grand Duchess managed it beautifully between them, and very much surprised they were to find it not so hard a task as they imagined, for God often makes works of love much easier in the doing than any one thought possible.

Baron Stolzenfeld, in the ten years since his daughter's marriage, had been ill with gout and many other rich man's maladies, and the solitude of his great castle fell very heavily upon him. He dreamed, too, so often of his dear dead wife and his living daughter, and of all their love and tenderness, that for the next day, and latterly, indeed for the next week, they were never out of his mind, and he thought himself a very unhappy man to be without the consolation of these two lovely women.

One day, therefore, when he was very low in his mind, and his proud heart was yearning for somebody to love him, he chanced to pick up a sermon which his house-steward, who was a very good man, had laid on a table as he was passing. The Baron read it. It was on the text of Christ's new commandment, that of loving one another, and a very excellent sermon it was; not even the Bishop of London nor the Archbishop of Canterbury could have preached a better. There were some things in it that touched the Baron's heart very much; therefore he inquired by whom it was written. It was the farewell sermon of Pastor Lagenvall on leaving Goldenthal, and his congregation had had it printed for love of him.

The Baron made no reply when he heard this, and, I am sorry to say, was angry with himself for asking the question, and with his house-steward for giving him such a reply. Nobody heard him speak again that day. But, as the steward never saw the sermon more, it is probable that he took it into his own room and read it again; for I am sure he could not have burned it, from what soon afterwards took place.

In the autumn the Countess went to pay another visit to the Grand Duchess; nor had she been long with her before the Baron was invited with a number of other great folk, to dine with her at two o'clock, as was her custom; for people are very old-fashioned in Germany. All the guests left about five, except the Baron, who was pressed to stay and take coffee with the Grand Duchess and the Countess; and a very pleasant evening they spent together. And, some way or other, I do not exactly know how, but they began to talk about Sorgvanen, and the Grand Duchess said she would have young Pastor Lagenvall for her chaplain, only it was a pity to take him from a parish where he was such a universal blessing, and where all hoped he would succeed the old Pastor, and soon remain all his days. To this the Baron, who both the Grand Duchess and the Countess spoke very freely, and gained in the end such an influence over him that, not satisfied with calling him every day about his dear wife and his dear child and family, he came again and again, and at length confessed his willingness to reinstate her in his affections and to embrace her children and her husband, for he was sufficiently old-fashioned in his habits to embrace his friends, according to the fashion customary in Germany; only they could not persuade him to say when he would do it.

This took a great deal of time, of course; for the Baron was far too dignified a person to do anything in a hurry, however much in his secret heart he might wish for it. There was time enough, therefore, to settle everything in a very deliberate manner; and though it was October when the idea of reconciliation first took possession of the father's heart, it was a thing really to be accomplished, it was Christmas Day before the plan was carried out. Though this, I must confess, was the Countess's own doing, for she did not wish the good Baron's heart or wife to be agitated by even this great pleasure, whilst it might be prejudicial to her health; besides, she loved Christmas, and contrived every year some pleasant surprise or other, or accomplishment of some loving and earnestly-coveted scheme of happiness for somebody or other. There never was, in fact, such a woman as that Countess for making people happy—for reconciling old enemies, bringing together long-parted friends, and making the hearts ache of the sorrowful to sing for joy.

When the new little baby, therefore, was born, she determined that the great christening should take place at Christmas, and that the Baron and herself would be sponsors, and that there should be altogether such a Christmas kept at Fredenvik as had never been kept before.

It must not be supposed, however, that the old Pastor knew nothing of her plans. He was in the whole secret, and enjoyed it as much as she did. Therefore, no sooner was all anxiety over with regard to the mother and the child than the preparations began in good earnest, and, I rather suspect, that he made the young co-minister also fully acquainted with the subject.

Everybody was to have new clothes, and I wish you could only have seen all the beautiful things that came down about that time in a great chest, which arrived from where or how, I know not; but in truth they were from Baron Stolzenfeld. They were the first offering of his reconciled heart—the first outpouring of his affection towards his daughter and her family; and as he had consulted the Countess, who had beautiful taste, and knew exactly what was wanted and what would be seemly, not only for the wife and children of the co-minister of Fredenvik, but for the daughter and grandchildren of Baron Stolzenfeld, you may imagine whatever beautiful things you like as the contents of that chest, and yet, I believe, they will fall short of the reality. But then this chest was only to be opened by the Christ-child on Christmas Eve.

The life at Fredenvik had been very pleasant and happy; still, it were vain to deny that the continued displeasure and alienation of her father was a great source of unhappiness to Lagenvall. Poor, too, they were. She who had been brought up in wealth and luxury was obliged to do many a menial thing for herself and her family; still, that was nothing to her, who was so rich in her husband and children, in comparison with the latter, who was her father's unforgivingness, and every day she prayed, and so did her husband, that the blessed time might come when her father's pride and anger should give way; when they might receive his blessing, and all be united in the heavenly bond of family love.

As I have said, therefore, many times, a wonderfully great Christmas was now to be celebrated. Pastor Lagenvall certainly must have known what the great joy was to happen, for, as if to prepare his wife, he spoke to her frequently of the willingness of our Father in Heaven to fulfil the earnest desires of our hearts, and she, on her part, was as certainly sure that the earnest desire for it, for she told her husband just before Christmas of a beautiful dream which she had that night. She dreamed that she was sitting between her father and her husband, holding a hand of each, and her mother, who had been dead so many years, stood before them smiling with ineffable love and joy, and holding by the hand the baby that was born the preceding Christmas, and which now looked like a lovely child of two years old, and she said:—"By this it shall be known that ye are my disciples, for ye have love one to another."

When, therefore, she told her husband this dream he encouraged her to believe that it foretold some great realization of love and family union. The convalescent mother thoroughly believed so, taking assurance from the altered word of the text, "for ye have love one to another."

And now, on the morning of the 24th of December, the happy children, yet only as the poor children of the co-minister, are bringing home, through the wind at the back of the parsonage, a small fir-tree, which the old man, Melchior, who looks after the garden and the crows, has cut down for them. (See our Coloured Illustration.) But it is nothing to the great tree which the Countess and her fat Mamsell are at this moment decorating in the parlour, the blinds of which are down and the door locked, and about which they two, and occasionally old Katchin, the old Pastor's housekeeper, will be busy till afternoon.

Then, according to the programme of the day, she will go to her own cattle in her coach, and, an hour later, return with a visitor, by which time the Pastor, his wife, and Adolf and Selma, attired in their Sunday clothes, will enter to receive whatever gifts the Christ-child, who on this occasion was to be no other than the stout Countess herself, might have brought for them.

But all this fine programme was entirely deranged; for, no sooner was the Baron under the same roof with his daughter than, unable longer to resist the impulse of his reawakened affection, he broke through all restraint, and, rushing into the common parlour, where there was only one candle, caught his daughter in his arms, and, forgetting all his pride and dignity, and all his ten years' displeasure, kissed her, and wept over her, and besought her to forgive him, as it he only had been the offender.

Everything, therefore, went wrong, according to Christmas rule, for a long time; and, before they could get into the great parlour, where was all the show, and everything had been so beautifully displayed; all her mother's jewels which her father had brought for her, and all the new dresses for her and the children, and the fine confectioning things for the baby, they had to bring out some of the candles and to spend at least an hour in that common sitting-room, for what could they want more than they had there?

But the Countess, and the old Pastor, and the children, Adolf and Selma, they all went, long before the hour was over, and saw the great Christmas-tree of the Countess and the little one which Melchior had cut for them, and wondered with a wonder that had not words to express it, at least as far as the children went, over the splendid gifts that were there displayed.

At length the others came also, and saw and wondered as the children had done. But nothing that was there could bear any comparison with the treasure of that renewed affection which Mrs. Lagenvall saw beaming in the eyes of her father as he gazed upon her and her children.

Such was the happy Christmas kept last year at Fredenvik. Let us hope that many such may be kept this, and in all future years, not only at Fredenvik, but where the work of love is complete, but all the world over, wherever there is poverty or sorrow, or severed hearts, or yearnings for affection, for in this way we are sure, not only of a "Merry Christmas and a Happy New Year," but of a joy that will last for ever.

KING CHEER.

KING CHEER he reigned in Aureoland,
With a cup for a sceptre in his hand;
A jolly King in trencher and cup—
He ate enough, he drank enough.

Till his head began to totter and shake,
And his hands and his feet to stiffen and ache.

The doctors were called, but they dared not say,
"Your Majesty drinks too much tokay."

So the King was no better for all they said,
And he ate and he drank till his eyes were red.

And Christmas Eve had brought no mirth,
And the King thought nothing was good in the earth.

Up rose the fool, whose every word
Was three parts wise and one part absurd.

"Uncle," he said, "never mind your gout;
I will make you laugh till you laugh it out."

King Cheer leaned back in his chair of state;
The fool went down and opened the gate.

In came a bowed man, hungry and cold,
And he knelt at the dais all floored with gold.

The fool caught up the King's golden plate,
And set it before him, the hungry man ate.

And the King beheld, with a pleased surprise,
How he ate with his mouth, and his cheeks, and his eyes.

And he rose himself, and took him the cup—
"Drink it out," said he, "and I'll fill it up."

The goblet was deep, and wide, and tall—
The thirsty man he drank it all.

Said the King to his lords: "I call it well done,
To drink what is ten months instead of one."

Said the King to himself, as he took his seat,
"It may be as good to feed as eat.

"It is better, I do begin to think,
To give to the thirsty than to drink.

"To-morrow is Christmas Day," said the King—
"I wish there were more of this kind of thing."

And he had not long to wish or to wait,
For they gathered in shoals to the palace-gate,

Ragged and wretched, and hungry and thin,
Keen in their clothes and light in their skin.

And he fed them all. Then he went abroad,
And sought them next in their own abode—

Sought them in evenings foggy and dim,
For he could not wait till they came to him,

And a change passed over the soul of the King,
A change like the change of a forest in spring.

And his face grew noble and fair to see,
And the crown sat well on his look of glee—

For he loved the glow of the wine-cup still,
But he drank half as much with double the will;

And he reigned King Cheer in Aureoland—
Reigned with his head, and his heart, and his hand.

And hence the blissful custom was bred
That at Christmas time, when the holly is red,

The palace-gates stood open wide,
And the poor came in from every side,

And he rose and fed each hungry soul,
And his praises reached to the frozen pole,

And he drank with a thousand mouths for one;
And such a king in the world was none.

GEORGE MACDONALD.

A PAGE OF NONSENSE FOR CHRISTMAS.

EVERY MAN HIS OWN CONJUROR.

IN these days of wizards and railways and magic lanterns, nobody's anything who can't do tricks. If you want to be the most wonderful man of your age, all you have got to do is to read carefully

How to Make a Cake in Grandpapa's Hat.—Get grandpapa's hat; kick it rather hard to show there's no deception. Take twenty of eggs, a pint of cream, some Harvey sauce, lots of sugar-plums, pepper, and stuff to kill blackbeetles; mix and stir briskly with a tallow candle, holding the hot over the fire till the mixture boils. Then give grandpapa a large spoonful, and see how he likes it.

How to Tell a Person the Number he has thought of.—Ask Uncle George to think of a number. Tell him to double it, lend you half-a-crown, and divide the remainder by forty-nine. Then ask him what it was. If he refuses to tell you, say it was three. If he says, "No, it was not," tell him you don't believe him.

The Spectral Fiddler.—This is a very marvellous illusion. Keep your company in the dark as long as possible till they become fidgety. Then get a spectre; send him under the sofa, and tell him to play the fiddle. The yourself in a knot to the armchair, and declare it's you. The company will then turn very pale, ask for brandy, and say it must have been the spirits—which it was.

CHEMISTRY SIMPLIFIED FOR YOUNG BEGINNERS.

Everybody ought to know something of chemistry at this time of year, or else they are sure to eat all the ornaments off the Twelfth Night cakes. Therefore, my dear children, you should be grateful to your kind papa, who makes you learn the following General Rules.—1. Never put your hand in the fire when you want a red-hot coal, but use the tongs.

2. Never carry gunpowder and lucifer-matches loose in your pocket.

3. Don't taste everything which looks like powdered sugar; it might be dangerous.

How to make a Light in a Dark Room.—First darken the room. Then take of spirits of wine, 2 oz.; deal shavings, as much as you can carry; gunpowder, about a wineglassful. Mix well together, and place them on the floor in the centre of the room. Procure a red-hot poker; apply it to the mass. This will soon light the room up.

How to Turn a Lady's Face a Brilliant Green.—Take of verdigris one pint, sap-green two tablespoonfuls, painter's green 4 oz., jack-in-the-green half a drachm. Mix with hot water and sugar in a basin. Ask the lady to hold her face over the basin. Give her head a push when she is not looking. Her face will now appear a bright green colour. This is a very pretty experiment.

How to Change Copper into Silver or Silver into Copper.—Borrow as many half-crowns as you can. Put them in your pocket. When the owners ask for them back give them pennies instead and say you've made a mistake. This will create a sensation.

How to Burn a Hole in a Piece of Velvet with Water.—Get your mother's best velvet mantle. Take about two drachms of nitric acid, put them into a test-tube. Say it's water; if they don't believe you, ask them to taste it. Pour it on the velvet. It will burn a hole right through it. This will gladden your mother's heart.

How to Make a Precipitate.—Take of detonating powder about two tablespoonfuls, skyrockets one bushel, blank cartridges twelve or more. Wrap them in a paper parcel. Make the company stand round with their backs to the fire. Give the parcel to any nervous old gentleman and tell him to put it in the fire. It will go off; so will the company, and precipitate themselves out of the room. Don't try this experiment more than twice a day.

FIRST-CLASS EXAMINATION AT MR. BADJOKE'S ACADEMY.

First boy, stand up. Now, Sir, how should you describe the conduct of those workhouse authorities who, averse to disbursing the parochial funds, say—speaking of a pauper—"pass him on, pass him on to his own parish?"

Answer. Why, Sir, I should describe it as a disgraceful case of pass him ony.

Second boy, stand up. Now, Sir, do you consider it a very foolish act to illegally dispose of a living in the Church?

Answer. Foolish? my dear Sir; I consider it simple simony.

Third boy, mention some popular errors.

Answer. It is a popular error to suppose that a gig becomes any larger when it is let out.

It is a popular error to imagine that the Bath Chaps of the shops are in any way connected with Mr. Mohammed's attendants.

It is a popular error to suppose Eily O'Connor succeeded so wonderfully on the first night because she was the Colleen bawn with a cull.

It is a popular error to suppose that Lord Bacon was at all too rich.

It is a popular error to suppose that the first flyfishers in England were the Angler Saxons.

It is a popular error to suppose that the family name of the Earl of Stair is Bannister.

Or that Dodington R. Cade is a descendant from Jack Cade;

Or that the counsel for the Crown gives legal opinions for five shillings;

Or that the individual who fails to see every one of these jokes ten t—well, never mind.

RIDDLES FOR THE RECKLESS.

AUNT BAD.—Why is my aunt in Dorsetshire superior to the person who shaves me?—Because he is only a barber, whilst she is a Berkshire.

HISTORICAL.—Where would you find a word that should suggest to Richard II. that he had best avoid Bolingbroke?—In the Dickshun'ary.

MEAN TIME.—What is mean time at Greenwich?—Beginning the dinner to a second when one is late.

A THUMPER.—Why should wife-beating receive light punishment?—Because it's a whack scandal.

GEOGRAPHICAL.—Why is an amateur performance like the village of Ealing?—Because it's several removes from Acton.

WORTHY OF FOOTE.—Why do we expect some from a gouty man?—Because he's a toe-martyr.

VERY DEEP.—When can't you believe Truth?—When she lies at the bottom of a well.

TO AMATEURS.

SENSATIONAL DRAMAS, IN THREE ACTS: TO BE PLAYED IN ACT A MINUTE.

[Amateurs at Christmas time are very good fun, but they seldom have time to get perfect in the words of their parts. The break-up at school is speedily followed by a break-down (dramatically speaking) at home. Now, a "break-down" is all very well in a burlesque, but it is out of place in a serious drama; so to remedy the evil we herewith furnish three pieces suited to the shortest memory and the most vivid imagination.]

DRAMA NO. 1.

OR,

THE WRAITH, THE BOGUEY, AND THE WHISKY FIEND.

ACT I.

SCENE. A Glen, mountainous if possible, at all events craggy. Much will depend on the furniture, which in consequence should be strong.

Enter BONDUCA THE BANDIT U. E. R.

[Everybody knows the meaning of that, of course. It is upper entrance right; and, being translated for the use of families, signifies the side door of the back drawing-room leading on to the stairs.]

Bonduca. Yo crags (addressing the chairs) and Peaks!
I'm with yo once again.

[Tells the audience the history of his life in dumb show.

But, hark! I am interrupted.

[Is interrupted. The curtain descends.

SCENE. View Abroad.

Enter WRAITH.

Wraith. Ha! ha!
Echo (on the second landing). Ha! ha!
Bonduca (entering). It is the remorseless spirit of my departed conscience.
Wraith. No such thing!

Enter the BOGUEY.

Bogney. Neither am I.
Bonduca. Both in league against me! There is nothing for it but this.

[Exit, leaving the audience in doubt. A pause, during which the curtain descends.

ACT III.

SCENE. Same as the two previous ones.

Bonduca (alone). I have taken advantage of the calm evening to go out of my mind. No matter!

Whisky Fiend. Behold me!
Bonduca. Ha! ha! ha! (Wildly.) The spirit of my wife!

DRAMA NO. 2.

JOLLY JACK JUNK;

OR,

THE PRIVATEERSMAN AND THE PRODIGAL.

ACT I.

SCENE. A Homestead. Cattle are heard to low, pigs to grunt, and all is happiness.

Enter a TRAVEL-STAINED WAYFARER.

Travel-stained Wayfarer. It is the house of my forefathers!

SCENE. The Same. TRAVEL-STAINED WAYFARER gazing as before.

Travel-stained Wayfarer. And yet it is different!

Enter from homestead on OLD MAN and a YOUNG WOMAN.

Old Man. What day is this? [Directs.
Young Woman. The thirty-sixth of March, dear uncle.
Old Man. Something whispers to my heart it isn't.
Travel-stained Wayfarer (coming forward). Father!
Old Man. The prodigal! The privateersman!
Young Woman (blushing loudly). Perhaps it is better as it is.

[On this complicated situation of distrust and mystery the curtain descends.

SCENE. Foreign Parts.

Old Man. I see it all.
Young Woman. How could we doubt him?
Travel-stained Wayfarer (to audience). And if our kyind friends will forgyve our many shortcomings, there will be not a happier fellow in the world than Jolly ——

[OLD MAN (who still directs) looks as if he was about to add "Dick the Lamplighter;" but, on receiving a wink from the prompter, doesn't.

Young Woman. Jack Junk!

DRAMA NO. 2.

THE VIRTUOUS PEASANT;

OR,

ACT I.

SCENE. A Glade in the glooming. Chairs. HARRY OAK (the Virtuous Peasant) alone.

Harry Oak. (Proudly.)—Let me assure the haughty aristocrat that beneath this waistcoat—(feels heartily waistcoat.) Ah! What's this? The mark of something or other. Then I am the heir to the Ravenswing property! [Marries off to claim it. Curtain descends.

ACT II.

Enter LORD RAVENSWING, frowning.

Harry Oak (entering). I do!

[Chord, and great consternation among the cucumbers.

Lord R. Something tells me I am a villain.
Harry. Something speaks the truth. Behold!

[Opens his virtuous waistcoat.

Lord R. Ha! The mark of something or other!

The mark of HOTE! Farewell, bright world!

SCENE. Side View of the Property.

Enter the SPECTRE and the Virtuous Peasant.

Harry. Then you were not?
Spectre. Oh, dear, NO!
Harry. Ha, ha! Then that explains all.
Will you accept my hand?
Spectre. Certainly.

[Chorus of cucumbers in the distance, to which the curtain falls, successive.

(We would suggest that there should be an hour and a half's pause for refreshment between each act, and that, if it could be managed, the performance should cease after the first act. We merely throw this out for what it is worth.)

SONGS OF THE WAITS.

THE HORN.

I plays the 'orn!
At early morn!
The 'orn so clear and loud;
Much better, too,
Than I can do
When bother'd by a crowd.
When in a public-'ouse I plays—
Wan'd with a pint of stout—
"The Sea," or "Light of other days,"
The barman "puts me out."

THE CLARIBET.

My clarinet is being cracki'd and missing of a key,
My high notes, pi'aps, is not quite what my high notes ought to be.
Which, too, the lower tones is not as perfect or as clear
As would completely satisfy a edducated ear.

THE PICCOLO.

Sharp, shrill, and clear
I strikes the ear,
And I should like to know
Of somebody the reason why—
Considering I'm wery high—
I'm called the picco-lo?

THE TRIANGLE.

I tried all sorts of means of life—
Tried 'taters—tried a mangle—
Tried matrimony, then my wife
Advised me to tri-angle.

NONSENSE RHYMES ON A NEW PRINCIPLE.

Down in far Trinidad
There once dwelt an old cad,
Who was born very good, but who died very bad.

In Seringapatam
Lived a party named Sam,
Who rather liked turnips with raspberry jam.

In Mesopotamia
There dwelt an old A-meer,
Who said, "What an old fool I was that I came here.

In Western Wallachia
Resided a fakeer,
Who started in life as a small undertaker.

In Fulham (near Putney)
Dwelt one whose great glut'ny
Made his tight-fitting waistcoats come always unbutt'ny.

Far away, up in Scinde,
Dwelt a madman who grin'd
And declared he was Banyan and then Jenny Lind.

Two folks, whose name Miles is,
Say beef in St. Giles's;
The one roasts his share, but the other one kiles his.

And so on, as long as you please. N.B.—This delightful discovery is not registered.

SONG OF THE PANTOMIME "SUPER."

The people talk of Christmas joys,
The little gals and little boys
Forgets to bother for their toys
At merry Christmas time.

The families together meets;
Old parties stuffs theirselves with sweets;
It's horrible what things they eats
At merry Christmas time.

Then to the theatre they comes,
Crammed as the gallery was with plums,
And there they sits and sucks their thumbs,
At merry Christmas time.

I wonder if one thinks of me,
As I come on as number three,
With mask as hideous as can be,
This merry Christmas time.

I holds a suit of banner screen,
And has a proud retainer's mien,
Perhaps my hands ain't over clean
At merry Christmas time.

I've been addressed in manner reelly,
For one as was brought up genteelly
Enveloped me in contumely
At merry Christmas time.

This three weeks past, at least, I've been Practising of this comic scene—
I thought I was a budding Kean
One merry Christmas time.

Now one of King Bluebeard's guards,
With horsehair beard like any pard's,
I'm knocked down, and kicked afterwards,
This merry Christmas time.

I falls, and trembles with affright,
Whilst folks are screaming with delight
A shilling's all I have a night,
At merry Christmas time.

Ah! when you gets home in the fly,
And pitch into the cold meat pie,
I seeks my garret high and dry,
This merry Christmas time—

Dreams when I went the play to see,
And roared at super number three—
The role this season filled by me
In Christmas pantomime.

KING CHEER.—DRAWN BY JAMES GODWIN.

CHRISTMAS BOOKS.

IT is a gross and greedy notion of the peculiar gratifications of this season, which gloats over the enticing display of geese and turkeys in the poulterers' shops, and the grocers' store of condiments for the English Christmas pudding. We are too much reminded, by such preparations, of the comment once made by an envious street Arab on the advertising inscription, "What to Eat, Drink, and Avoid." "Ah!" said he, "I see: eat and drink as much as yer can, and avoid bustin'." This is not the spirit in which we should be invited to enjoy the good things so abundantly provided for the Christmas repast. As the comfortable tradesmen above mentioned good are wont, in these days of mid December, to set forth their stock of edibles bedecked with holly and mistletoe, in token of a special custom of purchasing and feasting at this season, in like manner do the caterers for our literary entertainments make the multitude and quality of Christmas books published this year might tempt the intellectual appetite to a dangerous excess in these dainties, if it were necessary to swallow the whole of a Christmas book, or of a Christmas dinner, in the course of one afternoon. Happily, these are pleasures which can be enjoyed temperately and at leisure, when Christmas and Twelfth Night have passed.

The Lake Country, by E. Lynn Linton, with a Map and One Hundred Illustrations, drawn and engraved by W. J. Linton; Little-hoge Hall, by Henrietta Lushington; Lilian Grey, a poem, by Cecil Home; Last among the Affghans, illustrated; Domestic Stories, by the Author of "John Halifax, Gentleman"; Scripture Stories, First and Second Series; Stories of the Apostles, by Caroline Hadley. (Smith, Elder, and Co.)—The literary interest of the first beautiful volume, with its useful glossary and botanical appendix, would of themselves merit a careful review; but the exigencies of the season, the flood of books, and the difficulty of performing impossibilities, render it necessary to deal with Mrs. Linton's elaborate work simply from the festive and donative point of view. As a contribution, then, to the ornament wrought to deck the shrine of Old Christmas, and to the means afforded kinsfolk and friends whereby they may show in some tangible form the love and esteem they feel one for another, it stands prominent amongst the gift-books of the season. Its exterior is noble, and its interior, studded with many a glorious illustration, corresponds with the outer splendour. Youth may be benefited as well as amused by giving heed to what is written in "Little-hoge Hall;" great delight may be derived from "Lilian Grey" by those who enjoy a tale of the heart told in musical blank verse; and whosoever has not yet read an account of the Murchanson-worthy achievements of Captain Campbell (otherwise Feringhees Bacha), who was "lost among the Affghans," have now an opportunity of reading one rendered additionally fascinating by five effective engravings. "Domestic Stories" is a new edition, with five illustrations, of an old favourite; and the last three excellent little books recommend themselves by their very titles.

Schiller and the Bell, illustrated by the Right Hon. Sir Edward Bulwer Lytton, Bart., with Forty-two Illustrations, drawn on wood by Thomas Scott, and engraved by I. D. Cooper, after designs by Moritz Retzsch; Pictures of English Life; Golden-Hair, by Sir Lumley Alexander Russell, Bart.; Child's Play, by W. B.; Noodle-dom, by Charles Bennett. (Sampson Low, Son, and Marston).—Poetry could scarcely do justice to the first elegant volume. How, then, will it fare with plain prose? It may be said that it is shapely, that its covers are handsome with green and gold, or gorgeous with scarlet and gold, or gay with blue and gold; that the leaves, lying smoothly between the covers, are of exquisite texture and of delicate tint; that the neat, clear print is a triumph of typography; that the words upon the pages represent a translation, due to the graceful pen of Sir Bulwer Lytton, of one of the finest poems in the German language; that the illustrations which follow the words are themselves nothing less than "a joy for ever;" yet the words will fail to leave in the mind so correct an idea of the book ensemble as one glimpse would convey through the medium of the senses. It must be seen to be appreciated. It is called a "gift-book," and it is worthy to be accepted by the queen of beauty. The projectors of the second book have chosen a good theme, but have only half performed their task. The cottage-home life in England which they profess to illustrate is much too varied a subject to be adequately represented in ten pictures, even if they were selected from the most picturesque phases of that life. The size of the engravings and the elaborate pains bestowed upon their execution seem to indicate an ambitious desire to achieve something noteworthy; yet we close the book with a feeling that we should have liked to see the pictures half the size and twice as numerous. "The Cottage Door" is good, except the face of the young woman, which is constrained in its expression. "Fireside Joys" is a well-composed picture. "The Sick Child" reminds us of the picture by Cooke, with the same title, which was exhibited in the Royal Academy a few years back. "The Race Down the Hill" also brings back memories of a certain drawing by Birkett Foster exhibited in the Water-Colour Gallery a year or two since. "The Boy Child" is very good, and, to our mind, takes rank as the best in the book. The third, a "tale of the Pilgrim Fathers," illustrated by eight very nice engravings, is about grim Puritans, sagacious redskins, pretty savages, lovely wigwams, and daring filibusters. In fact, it deals with characters such as one associates gratefully with the name of Fenimore Cooper. It cannot be said that the author has reached Mr. Cooper's height; but there are exciting incidents in abundance, innumerable hair-breadth escapes, picturesque and pretty dialogue, and blood is shed with prodigious liberality. Had the machinery been less loose, the fabric would have been charming. Of the last two volumes, both certain to cause the dimples of delight in the cheeks of chubby childhood, the former contains literatures after the well-known fashion of

> We Willie Winkie
> Runs through the town,
> Up stairs and down stairs,
> In his nightgown, and is enriched with numerous illustrations, graceful as any that ever charmed the wistful eye of babydom. The plate which accompanies "Peep-peep" is simply delicious. The latter is made up of a series of short, semi-comical stories, written, as well as illustrated, by that true friend of and expert in children, Charles Bennett, and needs no further recommendation.

Echoes of an Old Bell, by the Hon. Augusta Bethell, illustrated by F. W. Keyl; Pictures of Girl Life, with Frontispiece by F. Eltze; The Happy Holidays, by Emma Davenport, with Frontispiece by F. Gilbert; Hocus the Dwarf, by Henrietta Lushington, with Illustrations by C. J. Fuwell; Conquests, the Cricket, and the Counterpane, by Frances Freeling Broderip, illustrated by her Brother, Thomas Hood; Merry Songs for Little Voices, by Frances Freeling Broderip and Thomas Hood, set to Music by Thomas Murly, with forty Illustrations; The Princess Pilgrimage, by M. Betham Edwards, illustrated by T. R. Macquoid; Fun and Earnest, by D'Arcy W. Thompson, illustrated by Charles B. Bennett; A Week by Themselves, by Emilia Monrat Norris, with Illustrations by M. C. Edwards. (Griffith and Farran.)—These books have all one characteristic in common—they may be safely put into the hands of children; and they are nearly all liberally and excellently illustrated. The first has to do with fairy lore, and is bright with many a spark of playful fancy; the second, most for the perusal of girls in their teens, is noticeable for a certain elegance of style and diction and for commendable lessons of life; the third inculcates good moral doctrine by means of a spicy full of natural description and natural dialogue; the fourth (from which we have borrowed an illustration) is an intermixture of the fanciful and the real, cleverly written in plain language composed of easy words; the fifth is a mixture, in simple fashion, of prose and verse, and in style and method resembles the fourth; the sixth bears a title which is of itself sufficiently explanatory, and should be added, however, that the illustrations are, in many instances, very quaint, spirited, and pleasing; the seventh is written in verse well-suited to children; the last but one is perhaps the best of the bunch—it is the composition of a scholar, a humourist, and a kindly man; and the last shows that its author has inherited the literary talent of her father, Captain Marryat.

Home Thoughts and Home Scenes, in original poems; The White Rennsvickers, by the Rev. H. C. Adams, M.A., with Illustrations; Perils on the Fells, by R. M. Ballantyne, with Illustrations; The Young Yachtsman, by Anne Bowman; Routledge's Every Boys Annual, edited by Edmund Routledge, with One Hundred Illustrations; Golden Light. (Routledge, Warne, and Routledge.)—The first of these, blazing outside with scarlet and gold and sparkling inside with poetical gems and brilliant specimens of illustrative talent, will take a right royal present. The illustrations by A. B. Houghton, engraved by the Brothers Dalziel, are excellent in quality and profuse in number. Mr. Houghton's children seem positively to live. The poetical accompaniment to our Engraving of "The Child Among the Rocks" is the composition of Dora Greenwell, and it will be seen from the opening lines, how picture and poesy harmonise. The other poetical contributors to this splendid volume are the names of modern poetesses, Jean Ingelow; Mrs. Tom Taylor, the Hon. Mrs. Norton, Amelia B. Edwards, Gerald Humphreys; and the author of "John Halifax, Gentleman." Schoolboys will pounce with avidity upon the four next of these books, whereof the first has for its theme "the vice of bullying;" the second abounds with adventure and frolic; the third, which has several striking illustrations (though no mention is made of that which we have borrowed or of any other upon the titlepage) has many stirring scenes of life in Sweden and Norway; and the fourth (which, by-the-way, contains the second specimen in the collection which are proverbially attributed to variety. The last is "Golden Light," a good book for the young containing scripture histories, illustrated by "eighty pictures drawn by A. W. Bayes, engraved by the Brothers Dalziel."

> Underneath thy feet are rocks, and o'er thee

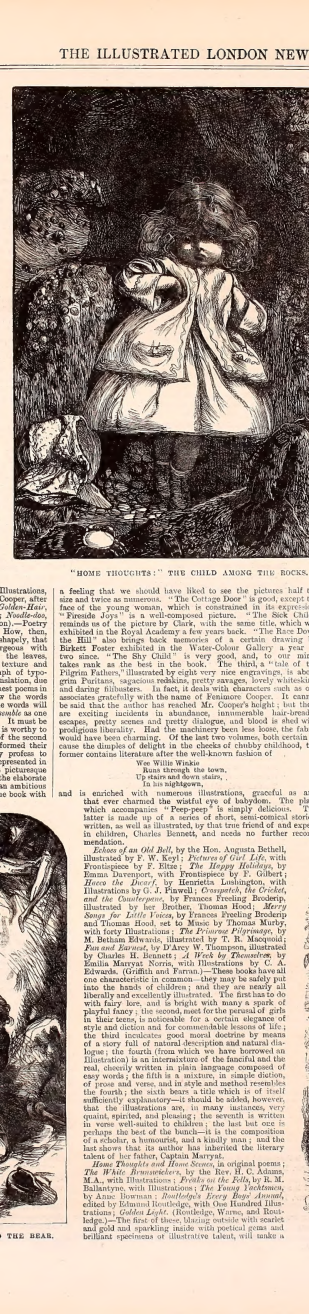
Parables from Nature, by Mrs. A. Gatty, with Illustrations. (Bell and Daldy).—Handsome outside and charming inside, there can be no more appropriate Christmas gift than Mrs. Gatty's "Parables." They are illustrated by the designs of no less than sixteen notable artists—by G. W. Eope, F. R. Calderon, W. Millais, W. Holman Hunt, Otto Speckter, G. H. Thomas, R. Warren, Lorenz Frölich, W. B. Scott, E. B. Jones, Noel Paton, Simon Mair, John Tenniel, Joseph Wolf, W. P. Buxton, M. E. Edwards, and Charles Keene.

Normandy, its Architecture and History, a Sketch, by F. G. Stephens. (Alfred W. Bennett.)—The sun does not look down on or lend his rays to the photographic illustration of nobler architecture than that of Normandy, unless Normandy have been much misrepresented; and those who have the good fortune to be presented by their kind friends with a copy of Mr. Stephens's handsome volume will find twenty-five photographic proofs that there has been no misrepresentation on the part of enthusiasts who have extolled the Gothic architecture of Rouen, Caen, Falaise and other Norman towns.

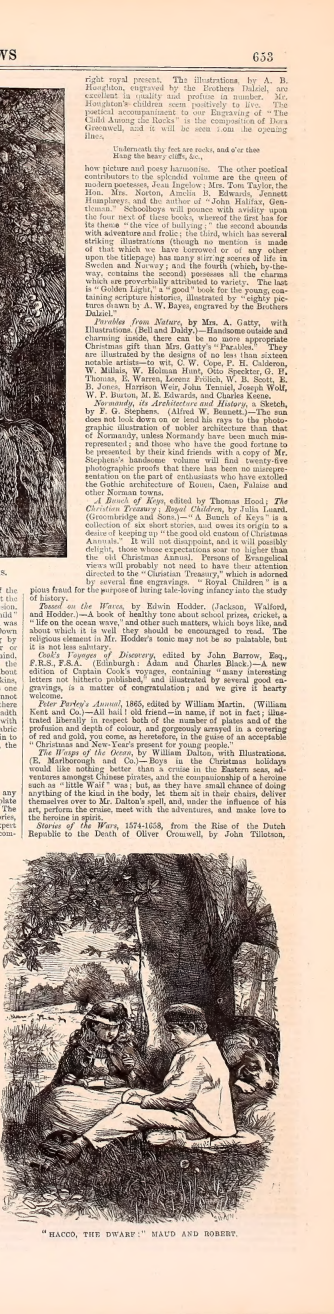
A Book of Boys, edited by Thomas Hood; The Christian Treasury; Royal Children, by Julia Luard. (Groombridge and Sons.)—"A Bunch of Keys" is a collection of six short stories, and were its origin a predecessor of keeping in "the good old custom of Christmas Annuals." It will not disappoint, and it will possibly delight, those whose expectations soar no higher than the old Christmas Annual. Persons of Evangelical views will probably not need to have their attention directed to the "Christian Treasury," which is adorned by several fine engravings. "Royal Children" is a book of "life on the ocean wave," and other such matters, which boys like, and about which it is well they should be encouraged to read. The religious element in Mr. Hodder's tome may not be so palatable but it is not less salutary.

Cook's Voyages of Discovery, edited by John Barrow, Esq., F.R.S., F.S.A. (Edinburgh: Adam and Charles Black.)—A new edition of Captain Cook's voyages, containing "many interesting letters not hitherto published," and illustrated by several good engravings, is a matter of congratulation; and we give it hearty welcome.



Peter Parley's Annual, 1865, edited by William Martin. (William Kent and Co.)—All hail! old friend—in name, if not in fact—illustrated liberally in respect both of the number of plates and of the profusion and depth of colour, and gorgeously arrayed in a covering of red and gold, you come, as heretofore, in the guise of an acceptable "Christmas and New-Year's present for young people."

The Wrongs of Ike Green, by William Dalton, with Illustrations. (R. Marlborough and Co.)— Boys in the Christmas holidays would like nothing better than a cruise in the Eastern seas, adventures amongst Chinese pirates, and the companionship of a heroine such as "little Waif" was; but, as they have small chance of doing anything of the kind in the body, let them sit in their chairs, deliver themselves over to Mr. Dalton's spell, and, under the influence of his art, perform the cruise, meet with the adventures, and make love to the heroine in spirit.



Stories of the Wars, 1574-1658, from the Rise of the Dutch Republic to the Death of Oliver Cromwell, by John Timbs. Republic to the Death of Oliver Cromwell, by John Timbs.

"THE YOUNG YACHTSMEN"; GRANVILLE AND THE BEAR.

"HOME THOUGHTS": THE CHILD AMONG THE ROCKS.

"HACCO, THE DWARF": MAUD AND ROBERT.

illustrated; Gulliver's Travels, by Jonathan Swift, D.D., illustrated with upwards of 300 wood-engravings, from designs by J. G. Thomson, engraved by W. L. Thomas. (Bell & Daldy.) Absorbing interest attaches to the stories in the former of these two volumes; and the latter, so far as the "travels" are concerned, needs no recommendation. Let it be mentioned, however, that the abundance of illustration in both books enhances to a marvellous extent their literary worth.

Ella's Friends, illustrated by W. Harry Rogers. (Mathews' House, by the Author of the "Wide, Wide World." (James Nisbet and Co.)—The former of these two volumes is a little book, simple and unpretentious, but the prettier for its very simplicity. Ella's "friends" were the flowers, and the birds, and other creatures pronounced by God to be "good;" but of human friendship we know little—for a while, but then things changed for the better. We hope that many an Ella who has human friends will be introduced by them to the other Ellis and her wonderland friends. The latter is a tale by the popular authoress of "Queechy," who, notwithstanding Mr. Kingsley's assurance to "Squeers" (which readers of the "Water Babies" will remember), is likely to retain the popular favour. Several coloured plates adorn the pages.

The Illustrated History of England. (Bemrose, Worm, and Routledge.)—This book is arranged on a somewhat novel plan, embracing the history of England from the earliest times down to the marriage of the Prince of Wales, and is divided into chapters, each of which embraces an entire reign. Then follows a summary, concisely written, of the events of the reign, including all the points necessary to be noticed in a school history of England. The work contains two maps and upwards of 400 engravings, besides a chronological table and summary of remarkable events. The book is well got up, and deserves, and will doubtless obtain, a large and permanent circulation.

Tales of Fitful Love, by Theodore H. Barrau, with sixteen full-page Illustrations by P. Feroglio. (Darton and Hodge.)—Nothing conduces more to that "peace on earth, goodwill towards men" which was proclaimed to the world at the first Christmas than filial love; and tales which enforce that duty are, therefore, highly reasonable.

Children's Prize, edited, by J. Erskine Clark, M.A. (William Mackintosh.)—The frontispiece alone is sufficient to create a yearning for the possession of this collection of periodical numbers.

Through Macedonia to the Albanian Lakes, by Mary Adelaide Walker, with Illustrations by the Author. (Chapman and Hall.)—This is not one of the ephemeral Christmas books, to be admired for a while and then to be left neglected on a shelf; it is worthy of a better fate than to keep company as a mere ornament with the flowervases. Its exquisite coloured illustrations are certainly peculiarly seasonable, but its literary contents are full of interesting information and instructive entertainment as its pictorial embellishments are full of grace.

The Book of Psalms, with a Public Commentary. (H. Owen.)—A labour of love, dedicated by a father to his children. It is a sober-looking but valid a handsome volume, appropriate to the season when one is more than ever minded to follow the injunction, "Oh, show your youthful relations how the Lord has dealt!"

Hyperion, illustrated with Twenty-four Photographs. (A. W. Bennett.)—An illustration of books by means of photography is this year a more marked feature than usual. In this instance the artist, with his camera and his chemicals, has followed in the footsteps of "Paul Pennyman," and has produced a series of charming photographs illustrative of Longfellow's romance. Generally, photographers pay too little attention to composition in choosing their points of view; but this is a fault that does not belong to Mr. Francis Frith, who has shown great judgment in his selections, and has produced a most pleasing series of pictures.

The Months. (The Religious Tract Society).—In making a selection of poetry for such a work as this the compiler could not fail to include the best masses of England and America. There are few poets who have not been inspired by the changing seasons. Let assertion be justified by quotation. Here is one specimen (vol. iii., p. 208) :—"We must no more expect for (sic) present or fresh manifestations of set than we can to be summoned to the banks of Mount Sinai, and for God to flash His commandments in the sight of all the people. God is One, is permanent, is progressive. He never himself can therefore He never goes back!" Here is another (vol. iii., page 278) worthy to be inserted in a transpontine melodrama:—"Oh, Grattan! if, twenty years ago, when really I loved you far more than you were ever capable of loving me, you had stood before me the cowardly culprit that I see you now, I should have strangled you on the spot, and washed you, like vermin, beneath my hoof. Now that long years have passed and that in seeing you I look upon a stranger, and upon only just remember that I ever loved you, your sorry attempt writings from me but the paternalist pity, to be transfigured—do not doubt it—to pardon." And here is a third (vol. iii.):—"We can say this frankly, in case money should be of any object to you. Unfortunately," said the young lady, "money is of great object to me." One is accustomed to hear that money is an object, or is of great importance to many persons; but Mr. Austin deals (throughout his story) very harshly with the Queen's English; he governs or misgoverns it, according to his will. As to the moral and social aspect of his tale, it will be sufficient to state that at the end the following singular family party is collected into one household—Mr. Mortimer Dynely, his daughter Mary, Mrs. Dynely (widow of Mortimer Dynely's cousin), by whom Mr. Mortimer Dynely, during his cousin's lifetime, had a son; Walter Dynely, the illegitimate son of Mr. Mortimer Dynely and Mrs. Dynely, and Florence Dynely, who, when a baby, was palmed off by Mrs. Mortimer on Mr. Mortimer Dynely as their own daughter, and who is at the conclusion of the story engaged to be married to Walter Dynely. It will be allowed that there must have been great exercise of charity and forbearance to enable such a "happy family" to live together, but worldly cynicism would predict angry strife to come at any moment when Mrs. Dynely and Mrs. Mortimer Dynely, if there were not a "free fight" between all the members.

Adam and the Adamites. By Dominick M'Gonland, Q.C., LL.D. (1 vol. Bentley.) With much ingenuity, learning, plausibility, and earnestness, Mr. M'Gonland has essayed to perform a most difficult task. He has undertaken to reconcile the "religionist" and the "philosopher:" to show that these is really no difference between him who assigns six thousand years and him who assigns a hundred thousand years of duration to the human era. The way in which he proposes to exhibit harmony will be apparent from the following extract (p. 161) :—"If the fact be, that there were different races of man, originated at different centres of creation, and at different times, and if the man Adam was the last of these creations, and also the last and most perfect of all the works of creation, then it natural and consistent that he should enter into life, and not that of any earlier specimen of humanity, should have been recorded. How especially if all the pre-existing races had been inferior types of humanity, when compared with the man made in his Creator's image and endowed with immortality." Mr. M'Gonland seems himself to have become only recently converted to his own theory; for, in his "Sermons in Stones," he, "following Prichard and others as guides, without sufficient inquiry into the scriptural or ethnological evidence, put forward the proposition that all mankind had originated from a single pair of ancestors." His present theory may not have been necessary for his former argument; but one feels some confidence in authorities who are led by the nose by "Prichard and others," and are soon obliged to recant.

THE LIGHT OF OTHER DAYS.

OLD Watchman, thou who watchest not,
We smile on thy non-vigil now:
Sleep on, nor dream, thou slumbrous not,
That roystering Bucks prepare a row.
Clutch not in thought the Dandy's fee,
Nor seek to stop the fiery Blood,
Nor wake to find thy Box and thee
Down in the London kennels mud.

Buck, Blood, and Dandy, all are past,
Succeeded by the pensive Swell:
How long that gentler type shall last,
Some social Prophet, rise and tell!
And then art gone, and on the stones
Marches a helmed and stalwart Guard,
With bludgeon strong, and haughty tones,
Taught, for our good, in Scotland-yard.

We would not call thee back, old Guy,
Preferring our half-soldier friend:
Our fathers did not much rely
On what assistance thou couldst lend.
They mocked thy grunt, they broke thy head.
A guinea plastered pride and poll,
And well they knew thee safe in bed
When dangerous Crime was on the stroll.

Tis years since thou, to people's grief,
In husky voice the hour didst cry,
To wake the sick, and warn the thief
To hide him while thou crawledst by.
So for old resolution's sake,
We'll wil not fling thee quite away,
Friend of the reveller and the rake,
And foe of those who could not pay.

Folks called thee Dogberry; but, alas!
There was small likeness 'twixt the two.
Save that they "wrote thee down an ass,"
And what they wrote was mostly true.
Thou like dear Dogberry! with his saws
And proverbs, and his mutual flatteries,
And logic used to prove that laws
Were never meant to give offence.

His teaching, in its easy way,
Was full of honesty and love;
For gentle foe nor rougher day
Too little serpent, too much dove.
But there was quaintness in his white,
And license in his simple phrase:
We won't have you compared with him—
Old surly Light of Other Days.

He bade the handsome man give thanks
That he was such, but make no boast:
Forgave the ugly man his ranks,
And laid them to the bumper toast.
The very thief he would not hang
Who "any honesty" could show,
But charged Messina's guardian gang
'Twere best to let the rascal go.

But when two villains, in cold blood,
Against that lady did conspire;
And pinioned in the prison stood,
The good old man blazed like fire.
"Did they serve Heaven?" They answer fair,
But still the kind man's anger flames:
"Write down Heaven first," said he, "and not bear
That name should follow villains' names.

They called him "ass," but he had got
Their arms "in bond" and tracked their lies,
And therefore gave them, fierce and hot,
His just return that he was "wise."
He had his wealth, and second gown,
And taught the knaves this moral then—
That Fortune does not always frown
On honest, simple, learned men.

He cleared goose Claudio's darling "bird"
From all the princely scoundrel's stains,
And from the good old Noble heard
"Thanks for his care and honest pains."
And when the Duke his largess dun,
He paid it with a genial prayer.
That night he treated all his crew—
Who then was richer than Master Blue?

No, no, old grub in yonder cell,
You came of quite another breed.
Our old domestic annals tell
How you'd have served poor Hero's need,
You'd not have used that rascal pair,
Or if you had, we understand,
They'd soon have vanished, free as air,
Five guineas in your dirty hand.

Of many a boon we Britons owe
To one whom all good Britons praise,
'Tis not the least that at a blow
He quenched the Light of Other Days.
A better guardian fills your place,
We're glad to know you've passed away:
But keep a copy of your face
To help our mirth on Christmas Day.

S. B.

WHO is the poorest and yet the noblest Peer? Answer. Baron Honour (barren honour).

WHY is a policeman never run over? Answer. Because he is never in the way.

WHY are a quarrelsome drunkard and a leaky boat very like one another? Answer. Because they both require bailing out pretty frequently.

AT LAST!

A STORY WITHOUT A SENSATION.

BY HAIN FRISWELL.

CHAPTER I.

"THERE are philosophers, of whom I am one," said the sick man, with a smile, "who do not credit woman's friendship. I don't mean towards man—that's certain enough; but towards one another. If they are friends while they are girls, the friendship soon disappears when they grow into women; nay, the apposition of a lover will make friendship fly away as quickly as possible."

This was by far too long a sentence for one so very ill, although produced by fits and gasps.

"Perhaps you are right, my dear boy," said a gearlsman by the bedside, holding the dying man's hand in his. The two men were old schoolfellows, and at this time of trial the old boy feelings came back. It was again Harry and Willy with them, and Harry lay in the darkened room—a strong, powerful man suddenly stricken down in the midst of his life and strength. He had been forbidden to speak, but speak he would; he had so much to say, and he endeavoured to say it, although his life-blood welled up to his lips every time he spoke.

Willy Fraser, who sat clasping his hand, spoke in a very low tone, as if to hush his friend, and continued holding up his finger as he spoke. "Perhaps so; but what do we want with a philosophical disquisition now—all you have to do is to get well." The patient shook his head. "At any rate," said Frazer, "Oh, hang it, Harry, don't die—don't think of dying now."

There was so much feeling in these broken words that the dying man turned towards him with a sad smile and marked the tears in his eyes. He would have spoken, but his friend put his hand over his mouth. He saw at a glance that William Frazer believed in him as he had always done—believed that by an act of will he could do more than any doctor in the land, or in the world. The reason of this faith was that Harry and Willy, at school and through life, were two different beings. Harry Armstrong was a dark, strong fellow, with a chest big enough for two; an arm which served him well, a ready bold wit; and, in fact, power in his body and plenty of it too. He had protected Frazer, who was but a weak little fellow, soft and docile, but very clever; and, who of course, as we all of us like those whom we protect, began to like him. The mutual respect and liking continued through life, and, as I have mentioned above, Frazer was rich, and not very well able to help himself; Armstrong rich, and able to help others. He helped his friend to a very decent match and to a cozy place; and he helped himself to one of the handsomest wives in the kingdom, who brought him a daughter, and then shortly died. Then suddenly, too, he began to lose his heartiness; and although twelve long years he was always a foremost man, never the man he used to be. That great chest of his, which ought, as the doctors said, to have been sound enough for anything, grew very troublesome; he caught cold upon cold, neglected himself, and was at last brought down here by what he called him, with no hope of life; his will made, his fortune left to his daughter, and his daughter and all her future to one whom he could trust—his soft, tender old schoolfellow, who was now half the man he was, but was still, in life at least, worth vesty thousand times more. Armstrong knew and felt all this, and yet could not, dared not, say what was nearest to him; and Fraser looked at him to explain the asking eye very earnestly and very fondly. Suddenly that eye grew very bright indeed, and Frazer in alarm rang a little bell. The physician came in, the patient rose suddenly from the high pillows that propped him up, put his white handkerchief to his mouth and covered it with crimson blood—and then lay back never to speak more.

Some months after this Mr. William Frazer, in his comfortable house in the New-road—which then was in the country, as the open fields stretched up to Hampstead and Highgate—sat quietly tasting a glass of old port—and wine of 1820 was then of the future—and looking out upon his half-moon lawn and the circular sweep of gravelride, up which the gigs of about a dozen were slowly driving. They contrasted as much as the two schoolfellows could have done. One was dark, somewhat tall, and very beautiful; the other fair, petite, graceful, and with an ugly pucker of worry clothed in insurgents, almost without a bow or ribbon; the other was dressed in white, with lilac ribbons and bows, and with a huge straw hat with lilac streamers to it. The difference extended even to the ponies; one was finely bred, strong, and with a dash of the thoroughbred; the pony, that took liberties, and was obstinate, and fond, would only go by fits and starts, and was altogether an irregular pony, decently quiet to ride and drive, but of no character at all.

These young ladies, whom Mr. Fraser was gazing on with quiet melancholy, were both dear to him; one, as being his own daughter, the other as his friend's daughter, and dear to his friend. The meditative gentleman quietly took another glass of wine—he was soft, pensive, and fond of good living—and as he swallowed it cracked a walnut, and said, as he peeled it, "Poor Harry! he died with a philosophical remark on his lips about the triumph of woman. Now, really, if he could only see these two girls, and know their deep affection for each other, I believe he would be convinced; I really do think he would, indeed, forgive fellow!"

Mr. Fraser was very easily convinced himself; and his conviction of the purity and depth of the affection of the two young ladies was well founded. They did love each other deeply; and although each other was Amy and Hetty, as girls will, with a dozen sweet adjectives by turns tacked to the names. Amy was Miss Frazer, and Hetty,—the short, or, at least, Amy's diminutive, for Henrietta—was Miss Armstrong.

The difference was marked externally, extended to the minds of the girls; and hence, probably, their friendship. Amy wanted guidance; Hetty could give it, and did not at all object to do so. Amy was as soft and yielding as her father; Hetty was resisting, strong, commanding, very wise, and very pure—full of what Mr. Fraser called "the very best common-sense, A 1," which he, poor fellow, acquired with great difficulty, principally by experience, which, in his case, was indeed like the stern lights of a ship, and only lighted the track over which he had passed.

"Well, girls," said he, with a welcome equally tender to each, "and what have you been talking about?"

"Fortune," said Amy; "fortune, papa. And what a wonderful thing it is, isn't it?"

"'Tis indeed," said Mr. Fraser, looking at his glass of port with one eye shut, as if he were reading a sentence. "I never could quite understand it. Armstrong didn't believe in it, poor fellow! I did."

"Just like Hetty," said Amy; "but what I say is—just look here. Here we stand—we are about as old as each other; but look at the difference—she has all the beauty." Hetty smiled and shook her head. "All the cleverness."

"All the good sense, certainly," said Mr. Frazer; at which Hetty blushed.

"And, to crown all, the biggest fortune. Indeed, she is an heiress; and this poor dear, dear papa, is not worth half as much. I have heard him say so."

"But I'd give all," said Hetty, earnestly, "to have what you have—a father." There were no tears in her eyes. Hetty was not given to crying, but the tone of voice touched Amy so much that she put her arms round her friend's neck and said that she had been "a little fool," and a cruel one too, to remind Hetty of her loss; and Mr. Fraser cordially assenting in the self-imposed verdict, the conversation was changed.

For four or five years dark and fair lived on, growing, if possible, fonder and fonder of each other. Mr. Fraser every day found that his verdict was right, and that the two young women were fast friends. Mrs. Amy's character, as we have remained the same—so, indeed, ever change from our originals?—and Hetty, who had improved her externally, had not altered the soft, fond heart and the quiet, trusting mind which wanted so much some one to cling to and to protect it. Mr. Fraser had long given up any hope of ever making a mother, a character which Henrietta very quietly and wisely filled. She even took poor Will Fraser in hand—he was still Willy with his friends, though verging on his nineteenth year—and the old man and him lay by money she prevented him from spending a great deal. In fact, Hetty was the acknowledged head of the establishment.

She was busied in some household work, one time morning, accounts, which "always made Amy's head ache," and would, if Hetty had not been there, have made Fraser's pocket ache, while the father and daughter were together. It was very seldom that they talked of her in her absence. They both loved her too much to hide anything from her; but at present they did so.

"I suppose, Amy," said Fraser, who prided himself on his knowledge of the world, as most of us do, sometimes, "I suppose, they have knowledge but don't apply it, "I suppose we owe that invitation to Lady Trefoil's to dear Hetty. What a treasure she is!"

"La! papa!" said Amy, with slight impatience, "what! to get you an invitation to that stupid old dowager's, where you said the wine was bad?"

"Recollect!" said Fraser.

"Well, scarcable; and there was no one worth speaking to except Godfrey Harding. The young man is very nice, and I'll ask him and ask me to myself."

"Mercy!" said Mr. Fraser, cheerfully, "money is not only the root of all evil, but also the general attraction of mankind. At one time a young lady had two chances in life—that is, before she is born."

"Before she is born. Papa!" exclaimed Amy, in some surprise.

"Yes," continued her father; "the young being who is about to be born had two chances if a girl, and only one if a boy. If a girl it might be born poor—well and good; but then, if beautiful, its next chance came. Men married for beauty; and the daughter of a beggar might, from her beauty, be elevated to the throne. Having wound up this sentence thus prettily, Mr. Fraser rubbed his hands and apologised to his daughter for getting into a metaphor—for talking metaphysics.

"Chosen to fill a throne!" said Amy, with disdain. All their chances took place in the old ballad days, when the beggar lived at Belmal-green."

"There are good many beggars there now," said Mr. Fraser; "but no such chances. Yes; Godfrey Fielding was a nice young fellow."

"The only one in the company that I enjoyed the dinner with decision—an unwonted decision, too—" what my son, Hetty?"

"Miss Fraser thought that Godfrey Fielding had come as he entered, or she would not have asked the question. Hetty had to have it put fully to her, and then, with a very slight blush, answered "that Mr. Fielding's manners were very good."

"A man of a good family," said Mr. Fraser, who, in the absence of a husband, knew everybody; "good family, but no money. Poor as a church mouse; indeed, he will be a church mouse, for he is just taking orders."

"Ah! I supposed something of the sort, for he paid Hetty and me equal attention, and yet I would rather marry him with three hundred a year than any one else with six."

"Amy, Amy," said Miss Armstrong, with a slight shudder, "how you do run on!"

"Greatly," said Fraser, tapping his half closed hands together and making his finger-nails clutter with a little clash. Mr. Godfrey Fielding is what Lady Trefoil called formidable fruit for a poor girl like you. You know the blind beggar's daughter at Belmal-green, of you perverted pronounced it, did not marry anybody beggar?"

"Law, Papa, how mercenary you are," laughed Amy. Hetty blushed prettily and turned the conversation, and Mr. Godfrey Fielding dropped out of record for that night at least.

But not out of remembrance. Both girls thought of him, and both were very glad when, two days afterwards, he called on Mr. Fraser. He was in orders then; he had attended ordination and had taken his vows. He was, I am bound to say, a wilful young gentleman at times now, and in those days had not the M.B. waistcoat with the stepcollar, which even the lowest Evangelical now assumes. He looked very, very handsome, and was altogether a fresh-looking, honest, unassuming a young person as one could look on. There are pale-faced parsons; and sallow-faced parsons, and fat-faced parsons with a fine scorn upon some of the failings of our curates; but, believe me, there are some good fellows too! Godfrey Fielding was among them, a man who do their duty as bravely as any soldier who goes to meet his death or win his glory and promotion. The Rev. Mr. Fielding was, above all, generally. Shrewd, observant, well read, and full of knowledge, he never failed to please his acquaintance, and could, no doubt, turn his talents in the best direction to benefit himself and benefice instead of his duty.

Being manly, it is no wonder that both these young women liked him, and that he grew very intimate with Mr. Fraser. Months passed away, and Amy had once or twice to scold her friend and adviser, and Mr. Fraser had to tap his fat and delicate hands at some jokes, as he heard from his daughter of the refusals of good offers which Miss Armstrong had perpetrated—offers, too, such as would, in any other instance brought dignity and rank with them, emanating, as Amy said, from the "Trefoil lot."

At last Amy, who was growing a little more impatient than she needed, went a visit in the country, leaving her dear friend and adopted sister at home. Miss Armstrong, in her opinionated manner, the matter, and who was justly indignant because the young fellows would prefer looking for her rather than to her friend Amy, made some exception in favour of the reverend Godfrey Fielding, who came just as constantly to the house, now that Amy was away as when she was present, and, who, knowing that Hetty could receive as well as benevolence, seldom came without some sad story which touched her heart and at the same time excited her pity.

At length, one day when Amy was expected home, and when these visits had become very dear to Miss Henrietta Armstrong, the young clergyman left Mr. Fraser at dinner descanting on the excellence of port wine, and joined Miss Armstrong in the drawing-room. As in those days gentlemen were expected to drink as much as they could, three hours to prepare the coffee. Miss Hetty might be excused for her look of gratified surprise, although she well knew that the young Curate seldom exceeded one modest glass, and that Mr. Fraser, from whom she unconsciously inherited all his knowledge, rather despised him as one who did not or could not take his bottle.

"Well, sir," said Hetty, looking up into his face with a sister smile; "you have made an early appearance. I suppose you have some sad story to relate."

"Indeed I have," returned Godfrey, taking a chair and carrying it to the side of Hetty's sofa; "but I don't know how to commence."

"Indeed," said the lady, with a pretty impudence, putting her white hand in her pocket to feel for her purse; "you are generally very fluent on other people's woes, Mr. Fielding."

"But, alas!" said the Curate, "this woe is my own."

Hetty blushed slightly and smiled, as if she knew a cure.

He continued: "I have come to be your suitor."

The smile faded from Hetty's cheek; the pretty lips were parted, the breath came and went; she dared not turn her eyes upon him when he paused. He rose from his chair and walked a step backwards, then forwards.

"Pray go on, Sir?" she said, at last.

"Oh! if you can—you who are so rich, so good, so pitiful, and kind—if you can, said one who does not know how to speak, who does not approach one whom he loves"——

"This is pretty well, thought-reading-minded Hetty; "but, oh! there men. We women never quite understand them."

"——who does not know how to say a day come here purposely to speak, but yet found his speech die away upon his lips; oh! if you will let your lover—for I love you—plead for him—plead for him you all his life. In his energy the young clergyman had knelt on one knee to her, and now lifted up his eyes and looked pleadingly in her face.

"Godfrey," she said, quietly, but not calmly, putting out her hand.

"Yes, call me Godfrey. You give me hopes." He rose as he said this, and kissed the hand. "Call me Godfrey, and tell me that you will, me Godfrey, and plead for me as a sister would for a brother. I love, I dearly love your friend Amy—Miss Fraser."

Hetty took back her hand sad, and there Hetty sank suddenly on the sofa. He was too much agitated to notice her sudden pallor and distress, and, having once got through his difficulty, he proceeded quietly enough. "In the presence of the woman I love," he said, "I am a man, free." I dare to avow my love now to her; but at last I have determined to do so. Here is the letter; it is open. Read it, and then aid me if you can."

Miss Armstrong said mentally. "Yes," she said. "Yes, Mr. Fielding, I will do as you wish. Give me the letter, and then go. Her father," she had a pretty strong emphasis on the pronoun, "will miss you," and Mr. Godfrey was himself very much agitated, he rose hastily, and, thanking his protectress very humbly, joined Mr. Fraser at the port, when he astonished that worthy gentleman by finishing a decanter which was half full, and which the good man had reserved for himself. "By Jove!" said he to himself, as he returned, "I'll be bound, when he is a rector, he will drink like a fish." Having astonished Sophus terse by this remark, Mr. Fielding plowed himself up for the lady in the drawing-room, and feigning a call of duty, which indeed he set himself, and faithfully kept.

CHAPTER II.

In the mean time, whilst Mr. Fraser was wondering at the Curate's sudden incursion and bold attack on the port, Miss Hetty, her face pale, her lips trembling, and her hands cold, was walking backwards towards her own room.

"It is like Rosa's story of "Undine," that author has drawn a woman—what shall we say, a child, a sprite, without a soul, which have almost—but no, I dare not even write to her; but at last I have a great gift, is very wonderful and very beautiful. How Undine felt then, we know. Hetty, as she walked towards her chamber, thought of the story, and of the fate of the poor water-nymph, without a soul; but all hope, all care, all love had for the moment vanished. Had she been asked, she could not have given a reason for her conduct, but it would have been the same. The one object for which, during the last few weeks she had allowed herself to hope had gone, and gone for ever. Her love, her passionate tenderness, her whole heart and her, in spite of the hints of that young lady that parsons always took of the best, had been given to Godfrey Fielding, and now that they were quite right to do so, that being, in his opinion, their only way of doing good in the world; that they were allowed himself for one moment to think of Godfrey otherwise than as a good, kind gentleman whom she liked and respected.

Miss Armstrong, in Amy's absence he had called so often, and after he had availed himself of every opportunity of being with her, she had, in spite of herself, allowed her heart to speak to him. Not that we know, when she had made up her mind it was pretty well made up for life. Hetty was not a girl to sin out-and-out and a good one. Hetty only wished that which was good and right, to be done, and whatever she did so with all her mind, with all her heart, with all her soul.

She locked the door of her room, and then proceeded to prepare her dressing-glass. Her face was very pale, her eyes looked hollow, her hair was dishevelled, and she was not quite sure that she looked tragedy, She noticed all this. There were no tears—not a single tear.

She pitied herself somewhat in her own strong-minded way. "Poor thing! Poor Hetty! And Amy envied me my riches and my poverty; much they're worth to me!

Women are full of sources of hope came into her sad heart. She opened the letter hurriedly. "He may have been hurried and flurried, and have left out the "not," and I may be happy yet."

Quickly this faint hope of requital, this trust in the final Justice of the Heart, faded out. One glance at the letter, one glance, which saw it was a love letter, a letter of a father to a child, a letter of a brother, and to Amy herself to listen, was enough. The letter dropped unheeded to the ground, and Hetty knelt, bending low down with her hands upon her knees.

"Father, lover, husband! I have all these, and not one. Poor thing, poor thing!"

Some few hot tears came then; but Miss Hetty was not given to crying much, and she soon dried them away. She was not given to young ladies who are as full of true courage as they are of tenderness. But it was, perhaps, a little surprising to Mr. Fraser when a cup of coffee ready at the usual time, and Miss Hetty as quietly engaged in a novel as if nothing had happened. Nothing had; it was only a little mistake on the part of Mr. Fielding that is all.

As Mr. Fraser was very full of his port wine and rather given to philosophy, he had made a remark to himself on the way to the drawing-room, that Mr. Fielding's letter to her guardian or attempt to open the matter to him, was very odd, and he called to his daughter to ask Mr. Fraser to meddle his brains by reading out a dozen paragraphs of the Times one after the other, and at the same time to smoke a mild cigar, which latter was a favourite habit with him when he was thinking, and said,

"This is addressed to and concerns you, Sir; more nearly it concerns Amy, but Mr. Fielding insisted that I should glance at it. Perhaps it will be better that you to speak about it, after due reflection, to-morrow morning."

"Eh, what? The editor seems here to ——. Oh; she's gone," said Fraser, looking round. "Eh, what? Mr. Fielding! Oh, ah! I see."

He quietly finished the Thundering leader and then took up the letter and read it with a long whistle, and then went to sleep in an easy chair, and was not awakened by the entrance of the tea-tray, which Hetty herself brought in.

In the morning Amy, who had been driven over with a friend, came and looked in on her friend in bed-time, and found her in a deep meditation. She was delighted with the proposal, and said, laughingly, "Hetty, Hetty, you always said that Godfrey had good taste, and he shows it by preferring me to you." Hetty answered with her quiet smile, and, after a little more talk, Amy left her, and Hetty answered gently. Not so Mr. Fraser. He declared the marriage could not be—that it would never do for one begotten to marry another, and that Godfrey Fielding was a fool to propose to Amy, that he fell in love with the best and finest girl too, and the girl who had a fortune.

Mr. Fraser, who had been drinking rather more than usual Mr. Fraser's objections, on the understanding that no one was to think of marriage until Amy was of age, and so Godfrey Fielding had a little at this; but dear Godfrey obtained leave to come and pay those attentions which all find so sweet, and in a twelvemonth Amy and Godfrey were married, and were quite happy. Mr. Fraser died quietly in his bed of some nameless and uncertain disease, which seemed more like overgrown, somewhat wearied, to venture a joke now and then, too, and also to do his courtship very openly. Hetty was hardly ever held as de trop, although, with much delicacy on his part, Fielding would have made his sweetheart, if he could, less demonstrative, Hetty however, bore it all; she saw, too, how the strength of him whom she had loved was rather weakened by the contact with Amy than strengthened; she saw that, day by day, Amy did not rise to the noble position which her husband had hoped that she would. It was a bitter trial, but Hetty bore it all—nay, she took very quietly one or two severe scoldings from Amy, when, in employing her pocket-money, she had purposely sent away the Rev. Godfrey on some errand of charity.

"You will run him off his legs after those nasty poor," said Amy in a pet; "he has a curate taken me to an oratorio."

"But duty, Amy, duty," said Hetty, calmly.

"Oh, yes," returned the other young lady, petulantly; "bother duty; you shall have a whole lifetime to think upon our duty."

"And God grant we may do so," returned Hetty, with a sudden break in her voice; "God grant we may—Amen!"

They were married—Amy and Godfrey. Hetty was bridesmaid, and more affected—which I am told is no unusual thing—than the bride herself. Godfrey, to be sure, had a poor living, and Amy had but very little money; but they were rich in hopes, a kind of possession for which one of us pays any income tax, but which is yet very valuable; nor was the Rev. Mr. Fielding the only Curate who has had to deny largely upon that bank, a draught upon which, thank God, has never been dishonoured. Nor was it in this case. Miss Armstrong had been very busily employed during the weddingtour of her friends with the Rev. Godfrey, in shewed old Mr. Fraser, who, as we have shown, was surrounded with shrewd people, who, however, did not comprehend many of them to him. Mrs. Amy Fielding had been speculating upon some unknown admirer possessing her husband—that young embodiment of all the clerical virtues—with a living, or, at the worst, a curacy, a solicitor's letter awaited them on their arrival at their modest home, which contained the news that the living of Harwood Green, having become vacated by the death of the Reverend Samuel Purr, A.M., had been bestowed upon"—no one less than the Rev. Godfrey Fielding, B.A., sometime Fellow of Merton. Great was the joy of Amy. Those excellent sermons she was sure had done it all; whereas Hetty suggested that the gift might have some connection with the relation of the poor.

"Poor!" said Amy, panting; "poor, indeed! We don't know those beneficiaries in the least—not a rate payable; but what will we get from the poor. Godfrey will some day be bringing home orphans from the workhouse, I know."

She blushed as she spoke.

"Oh! Amy," said he, reproachfully. "I shall rather think with Hetty than you. May God reward our beautiful friend with work to good account."

She did so for ledge, as Hetty well remembered, when they all knelt down to family prayer, to bless the giver again and again.

Indeed, for sixteen years, during which Godfrey filled Mr. Purr's place, did he work with the same zeal. Little incidents occur in sometimes, for she was rather restive at prayers, and often turned round to look at the children, who, when they were three and a girl—never had the typhus fever at all, and never failed to bring home that look about them which is so like their faces or clothes. Poor Amy was, you see, not much given to rapt devotion, but, for three, fore, very well suited to be the "light of the parsonage," as some good lady has called the pleasant, sunny wife to the parson, who summoned to by the easy and comfortable Mr. Purr.

Not far from the parsonage, Miss Hetty Armstrong built herself a pretty little cottage, breaking the hearts of more than one likely young fellow who offered his heart and his empty pocket to her, and on more than one occasion refusing a man who could have done well on a pretty fellow. As time went on, and it became rumoured that Miss Hetty had "a little money," as the gossiping says, was a little unpromptable, the sieges put to her constancy became less frequent and crowd although she never, I believe, ceased to be the friend of the Godfrey Fielding who once took upon himself to declaim to Miss Armstrong on the duty and beauty of marriage, received such an answer that he never did so again. As Hetty was prime minister to her for the Amy, the chief friend of her children, the delight of the poor, and very often the shield of the husband, who, sinning against the power of her husband, we may be sure that that happy matron did not urge her to marry. Perhaps Hetty's heroism was never shown more than in the instances in which she, at the cost of much of the two, defended the wife with the weak point against the husband with the strong one. Mrs. Fielding, who, in her own household was the more than the cause of the victorious, she had a twisted crotchet in her head that she had done her duty in aiding the woman whose husband she had once dared to love.

Mr. Fielding, as we have said, never caught anything from the poor; but he caught and brought home with him sometimes from the grave-side of a rich parishioner, who had left him a legacy and whom he rose from the bed of sickness to visit. Hetty was the friend who lent him for life, and that was a cold, which carried him off very rapidly; but Amy was in despair. Godfrey was at once exalted to an angel and herself to that state of martyrdom which posterity delights to draw for themselves in their troubles. Hetty, who could not come near to nurse him without Amy's being jealous of her, was by her side broke down in her passionate grief, when he died, and sat for many an hour by the dead in the darkened room, as by the living, to which only waits for all of us. The Christmas bells were ringing in the air; a sound, a merriment, seemed all about them, all around, but not in that sad, sad room. Hetty, with her soft hands clasped, looked backwards and forwards in her grief, when Hetty, taking the face-cloth from the dead face, looked upon the lips—those lips which Hetty had pronounced her fate—and murmured "Godfrey, dear Godfrey, you know I love you now, and you know I have been true. I will watch over those whom you loved; I will live for them and for you."

And, indeed, Miss Hetty kept her vow. She grew more active and more cheerful than ever as Amy continued to be widow's weeds, and that "best of it, for she could never know the loss of a husband—and such a husband—as Amy's proved came to her. Amy remained a widow, and the weeds fell off or grew into flowers through careful cultivation; whereas Miss Armstrong's plain, strongly-pronounced black was never laid aside. "I have been true," said she, "to you, and I will watch over those whom you loved; I will live for them and for you."

And, indeed, Miss Hetty kept her vow. She grew more active and more cheerful than ever as Amy continued to be widow's weeds, and that "best of it, for she could never know the loss of a husband—and such a husband—as Amy's proved came to her. Once Hetty, who busied herself in getting the boys—by-the-way, the young Fieldings were as fine a set of boys as ever were seen, and respect her somewhat more, than the mother who spoilt them—out in life, and in some degree to settle her self, was induced to be introduced into society. Hetty was once filled with a strange joy, and that was when Amy told her that the successor of Godfrey in the living once held by Mr. Purr was to be Frederick O'Fogey, of Mary Trinity College, Dublin—had proposed that she should put an end to her widowhood and become the wife of the Rev. Frederick O'Fogey. Hetty was very eloquent, was the nephew of an Irish Lord, and the younger brother of an M.P., and Hetty dreaded the birth of his relative to try his fortunes in the Anglican Church. His views were certainly extreme, but very powerful; and the parish, which had been decidedly clergy minded Mr. O'Fogey's active views and zeal to become uneasy and restless under Denis O'Fogey.

Amy, not at all averse to the tall, bouncy, and impressive clerie, promised to consult her friends—meaning Hetty and her daughter, and Hetty replied that she would consult herself. Hetty, she said bitterly; "his widow! I shoot on his widow, now as I ever was. Yes; let her marry; let her leave me at least his memory and his grave." But Hetty did not say this; she only thought it, for her husband; his wife should never share the fortunes nor receive the embraces of another man, and so Hetty, in her determination, Amy, sore against her will, to shatter the eloquent Incumbent of Hayward's Green.

Whether for the loss of this second aid and helper—and Amy always wanted two—or from a want of excitement, poor Mrs. Fielding after this not long took ill, and, quietly dying, was followed by Godfrey's side. And then, for a few years, Hetty still lived on, still manfully and bravely, the friend and friend of her children, whom she lived to see well placed and married—nay, to hear a little Godfrey and her grandmother. A young grandmother, indeed, but one who had lived to a healthful old age, never uttered, never guessed at, known to no one but herself. It was time the thorn she had worn so long in her bosom should reach her heart, and it did at last. One Christmas time, one merry Christmas time, when the air seemed filled with common joy and the bells were swung jubilant in the frosty air, and the children down stairs were shouting in their glee, one Miss Hetty Armstrong, an old maid, speaking, as was her wont, her Christmas day alone, suddenly rose up with tearful eyes from a half doze to obey a summons which we all must have, and said quickly, "Godfrey, I am here. At last! at last!"

So the summons came; so ended a life made happy by a passion repressed and well done, and of which it seemed to me fit that a record should be made.

MEMBERS OUT OF PARLIAMENT.

To most persons it would appear rather an odd assertion, that it was of benefit to get up nowadays a demonstration in Manchester. So far as its reputation is concerned, that extensive but thriving commercial city has every different supposition. There is an idea huge buildings which have been constructed for the purposes of intercommunication between people in other countries and very frothinking political people. Meetings there have always been more or less of a boisterous kind; in truth, the place has established a character for being the normal school of powerful mass meetings. It was therefore with surprise that one learnt the other day that a member for Manchester, who was inspired in some way to meet his constituents, did not, as the phrase is, draw anything of an audience to speak of. It seems that it has not been the custom for the members for this town to give an annual address to the electors since the time when Mr. Richard and Mr. Milner Gibson were the spoilers of quiet in the Manchester Athenæum, and Mr. Milner and not muggified with power and position, but is still saying smart things, never seems to think it worth his while to speak for more than five minutes at a time. In fact, both these gentlemen are men who in their own sense are made, are at the top of their own profession, which is to a Manchester meeting as Mr. Montague Smith is ridiculous in reference to eighteen pence in reference to capital. This decided failure will probably have its influence on Mr. Cobden's future political life in regard to popular assemblages; while the fact that a very successful man was got up at the close of the proceedings, probably a mode of striving up the necessary excitement which the occasion required, and which will not tend to exaggerate his anxiety to try the experiment again.

It was eminently characteristic of Sir John Pahington to present himself before a meeting for the distribution of prizes to a volunteer cavalry. There was he appeared and incredulous persons who do not see their whole faith to Sir John's powers as a horse-breaker will be glad to or that he reconstructed our colonial empire in 1852. Chemical and others, sturdy canons of cathedral chapters, who have rough presses, impugn his statistics, and even question his right to be considered a literary education; but it is utterly improbable that any such will be found in the case of forming a regiment could impeach his discernment, his skill, and his careful practice in the science of horse. He is, in fact, as much at home as the yeomanry uniform aforesaid as his dress is perfect; a thought too trim for modern lax fashions, but marvellous in its close adaptation and various outlines of person, though distinctive, style. On the occasion particularly alluded to, no doubt, he presented a remarkable example of how a volunteer should wear his uniform, and how micro of adjustment and precision of fit should be combined with entire activity; for, both as a horseman and a pedestrian, Sir John is an attitudes. Certainly, however, there was one feature in his dress that seemed desirous to instruct on the volunteers, against which most people in a fustian-jacket and old rides. This difficult to understand how a practical and sensible man like Sir John could have put on the spur in question. As the equipped yeomanry in a popular street many years ago did very much to shake the character and to depreciate the efficiency of that force; and if these be an enemy of the volunteers, the best way to do it is to can not conceive the domination of that body will be by making every single English people. It is very much to be doubted whether Colonel Edwards, who has justly earned for himself the title of the lamentary champion of the yeomanry cavalry, and who advocated popular measures as a Yorkshire point of view, would endorse this suggestion of a right hon. gentleman, who, on the first occasion that it is applicable to Worcestershire.

It has always been a puzzle to Parliamentary students how Mr. Massey ever got elected for Salford. Neither by his antecedents, and scarcely by his opinions, which, though Liberal, are Whiggish, does he seem qualified to have been drawn in an insensible manner into becoming a constituency which has returned members of that Manchester. Even in the hurry and confusion of the general election, when Salford was chosen on a Saturday night, it is not easy to understand how he became successor to Mr. Brotherton. However that may be, the many respects has justified the choice of his constituents so far as because, though having been thought worthy of being chosen to sit in Parliament, he has acquired considerable knowledge of the House. Besides this position, in the abstract when he has delivered his opinion on broader questions than those relating to private business, in which latter he is frequent, he has exercised considerable effect. Probably, if he desired it, which probably he does not, he might become Speaker when the present holder of that office vacates his chair. In adopting this line of political action of his friends, and cannot converse with his clients at Salford, Mr. Massey wisely took the opportunity afforded by the dissolution of honours to the students under the Local Examinations to disburden himself of a duty without very materially disburdening his political hand. He thus got out of that region of dense commonplace through which so many members have had to struggle, and by getting into office in the House, instead of, as he formerly did, in the Government, he has, perhaps, made a little lower, in the Parliament, while the Liberal party is in office, he could, no doubt, be restored to the chairmanship of committees, the appointment to which is conferred by the simple commencement of the Ministerial leader's moving, at the first time that the House goes into committee, Mr. So-and-So do take the chair. In that is the remaining branch of Parliament. If things should turn out that the next general election is conducted under the auspices of the gentlemen who now conduct the operations of the Opposition, it will be the duty of Mr. Disraeli, and not of Lord Stanley. But the matter is slight but significant motion above mentioned, and then of course it will not contain the name of Mr. Massey. But for the sake, as an admirable functionary in his particular department, let us hope for the best.

CURIOSITIES OF CHRISTMAS COOKERY.

CULINARY antiquities are generally dry matters: so little is to be gathered from names which, in the lapse of time, have lost their meanings; and the dullest puzzles for the etymologists. Alexis Soyer made a great mistake in publishing his "Culinary Museum" at a time so early in the existence of the Cookery of the Ancients, with a classical title. People like to be practical in matters of the mouth: the olden receipts can rarely be compounded in our time; some articles are not to be heard of; others are not worth getting; and failure is the consequence.

Christmas Cookery is however exempt from this weakness: its pièces de resistance have stood the test of ages, and, perhaps, one still towards the dwindle of the nineteenth century it was customary to bring up to gentlemen's tables, on Christmas Day, a boar's head, decorated with bay and rosemary, and, although the custom has grown obsolete among the gentry, a relic of it is still observable at the tables of the yeomanry, particularly of the northern parts of the kingdom, to which a pig's head, gaily garnished, is generally brought without having its jaws disbanded by either a lemon or an apple. And we see the same ceremonies at the Lord Mayor's show and at some London dining-houses.

Brawn is no longer the crack Christmas dish it used to be. Formerly it was in great demand for producing it: but, some thirty years ago, upon inquiring there of Mr. Chatterton, we found very little was made in the old city, the dish having grown nearly obsolete. Mr. Chatterton, however, was the young man of some taven-keepers preserving a dish of brawn to their regret at the present day, in respect to the old receipt. A noted dish in Kent, notwithstanding our failure at Canterbury; but Mr. Chatterton, the excellent cookery book, gives a lengthy receipt for "Tunbridge brawn." At Oxford the brawn's head is still served up at some Christmas dinners, of course, brought in with the customary state and placed upon the high table, the centre of the dish decked with flowers and garland, a lemon in its mouth, and the customary "grace" of Mrs. Rundell's receipts is "To Keep Brawn for the Christmas Day." The lady of "Domestic Cookery" has receipts for roasting a sirloin, but to show how old dishes drop out of use, and add a few, that excellent cookery book, Cree-Fydd's, does not contain the word brawn. The old-fashioned dish of roasted pig is also very rare, although in a small room in harvest-time, feeling him down to be upon; and before Christmas he was sufficiently browned and proved his excellence as a delicacy for the table.

The turkey has graced our Christmas tables for more than three centuries. Cardinal Wolsey had the bird as forming part of the Christmas fare of the farmer in 1578. The bird is also to be seen on the Christmas Day dinners, and occasionally makes its appearance in the couple of wild turkeys shot on the 4th of December, in the shooting story of the 1,200 tame turkeys, Parente, to which town they were brought, and there purchased by a gentleman, who, when they were fattened for Liverpool, where he arrived on the 18th; and when the 1,200 he embarked for Norfolk Island, Norfolk, for sport; and in the course of the 1,200 wild turkeys: there must have been desperate poaching towards the end of the season. Of the brown Norfolk: but if you find any of the red American breeds, say "Confound the bird," and have a duck or a goose.

Roast beef, although it still ages the paramount Christmas viand, the great dish being the baron of beef, such as is roasted at the Christmas Day dinners at Guildhall. The knighting of the sirloin is an old story.

Plum-pudding, or porridge, preceded plum-pudding. The former was called hachis until the reign of James I., when it became as soup at Christmas at St. James's Palace during the reign of George I. and to certain persons of the Court to the different officers of his Majesty's household. Brand tells us that, "Upon Christmas Day, 1806, the English cooks served up at St. James's Palace, on Christmas Day, 1806, the first thing served and mentioned in the list of dishes was plum-pudding. The quantity made was pretty considerable, for the following were the ingredients:

Leg of veal, 40 lb.; 6 shins of beef; 50 fourpenny loaves; double-refined sugar, 40 lb.; currants and oranges, 6 dozen each; 6 dozen old buck; 6 dozen mutton; 6 dozen lemons; 3 gallons of sack; 3 pottles of sherry, 40 lb. raisins, 40 lb. suet, 3 pottles, 2 oz. cochineal, 1 oz. mace, 4 oz. cinnamon, 3 oz. cloves.

The more solid form of plum-pudding was in use in Addison's time, though not to the exclusion of the porridge, which, in No. 383, he writes: "Without the aforesaid pudding and porridge." Again, by any excess in plum-pudding, or sack posset, or the like, which they are the prized parts of the dinner." Another early mention of plum-pudding occurs in Ned Ward's "Orgies," where a Chevalier d'Antieux, who, in 1698, made a voyage, in an English ship, says, "The plum-pudding was detestable. It is composed of pounded biscuit or flour, of lard, currants, salt, and raisins, which is made into a paste (it is not stated with what), wrapped in a cloth, and boiled in the pot with the meat, when taken up and out of the cloth, old cheese is strewed over it, which gives it the consistency of soap." Although the chevalier's pudding itself is not absolutely bad. However, we do not covet this pudding.

The old way of forgetting to put the liquid pudding into a cloth and boiling it like much in the manner of Lord Macaulay, during his embassy to China: and Lord Byron, through a similar mistake, when he was to have had a Christmas plum-pudding brought to table like soup, in a tureen.

In some parts of the country we hear of a plum-pie at Christmas, as the mummers in Northumberland, where Jem Jack, one of the characters, sings,

Who likes it better than I?

I wish you a merry Christmas and a happy New Year,
A pocket full of money and a cellar full of beer!

In the same county a poor plum-pudding is called a "hootingpudding," because it has not plums enough in it to make that they are worth while to hoot at each other.

The plum-broth and minced pie being compounded of spices, fruits, &c., were in token of the offerings of the Eastern Magi. The cradle, wherein our Saviour was laid, the imitation of the cradle or manger wherein our Saviour was laid, the ingredients themselves having reference to the Wise Men's offering. Mixon, in his "Tour in England," describes every family making a Christmas pie, "A great receptacle, the composition of this pastry being a most learned mixture of neats' tongues, chicken, eggs, sugar, raisins, &c.

Minced pies were derived from the paste images and sweetmeats given to the Fathers of the Vatican at Rome on Christmas Eve. So much were they considered as connected with Christmas that the Puritans tion they almost served as a test of religious opinions. The Puritans were bitterly averse to both plum-porridge and minced pies in connection with the season. Needham, in his "History of the Rebellion," sings,

All plume the prophet's son deny,
And spice-broths are not to be had;
Treason is in December pie,
And death within the pot.

Christmas, farewell! Thy days, I fear,
Are very many days to come;
So they may keep feast all the year,
And fast when they have none.

In "Hudibras," canto 1., 227, we find

Rather than fail, they will defy
That which they love most tenderly;
Quarrel with minced pies, and dispraise
Their best and dearest friend, plum-porridge.

Upon which Bluchard, in his sermon on Christmas Day, observes—ironically in use at this season up against the food which had been custom. In the Spectator, No. 269, describing a conversation with Sir Roger de Coverley, says—"A propos," said he, "you must know this honest gentleman is a bachelor, and by that means has missed the best part of his life; he is however very well versed in the theory of love, though he has given it over in practice." To make Mynheer, when it is parboiled, shred it very small; take a bag of suet, a pound of beef-suet, shred likewise very small; then put to it three pound of Corinthes (currants) well washed and picked, and a large pound of sugar, a nutmeg, cinnamon, and cloves, of each an ounce; so put them in at topps of it, and when they be made, and sweet not, therefore, mingle them all with beer.

Mincemeat should be made at least a month before it is used. Soyer tells us that the proper proportion is one weight of mince-meat are made yearly at Windsor Castle a month before Christmas Day.

Christmas cookery has another matter—a curious anecdote of a Christmas play. Leathes, the actor, found Garrick, Royal Garrick, scratched a drama entitled "The Christmas Tale," with scenery painted by himself, and introduced a dance of cooks. Garrick was to see what formed a new era in that species of art. This was a dance of cooks, dressed in white, with their aprons and caps, and led by one of the cooks, who, when they had

LIGHT-BROWN COD-LIVER OIL, prescribed by the Faculty throughout Europe, and acknowledged the world as the safest, most speedy, and most effectual remedy for CONSUMPTION, BRONCHITIS, COUGHS, COLDS, ASTHMA, RHEUMATISM, GOUT, GENERAL DEBILITY, MARASMUS, INFANTILE WASTING, RICKETS, and all SCROFULOUS AFFECTIONS.
It is incomparably superior to every other variety.

SELECT MEDICAL OPINIONS.
"Dr. de Jongh's Oil."
Medical Officer of Health to the City of London.
"It is very pure, and of a light colour, and is therefore, I believe, the best variety of Cod-liver Oil. It has great therapeutic power, and, from my investigations, I have no doubt of its being a pure and unadulterated Oil."
DR. LAWRANCE,
Physician to H.R.H. the Duke of Sussex, Oxford and Cambridge.
"I formerly prescribed Dr. de Jongh's Cod-liver Oil, and found it to be very superior to any other kind. I have now much pleasure in recommending it as possessing the same valuable properties as the Oil I formerly prescribed, and which I found to be of the most unexceptionable character."

THE LAST DAY OF THE YEAR.

TO-NIGHT the year 1864 will come to an end. Englishmen are not much given to sentimentality; but if there be a time when there falls a shade or two of pensiveness on the swift-moving current of their thoughts, it is when they watch "the Old Year out." There is generally a touch of pathos upon the countenance whenever we are conscious of taking our last look of anything, especially when that thing is a definite and considerable segment of our lifetime. The particular year the final disappearance of which we await may not have connected itself with our feelings by any strong ties of association. It may have been to us a mere continuation of time, without a single salient feature upon which retrospection can dwell with interest. The staple of its character may not have risen above a dead level of humdrum and routine. But when the hour of parting arrives we grow serious, and slide almost insensibly into the reflective mood. We instinctively cast a glance back at the good and evil the year has disclosed during its course, and it is not without some stir of the inner man that we bid it "Farewell, for ever!"

Whatever materials for reflection the year 1864 may present to individuals and families, it has certainly not lacked interest as far as nations are concerned. Great events, both in the Eastern and Western Hemispheres, have marked its progress. While we in this country have been affected by no violent changes, and have been conscious of no shock to public feeling, save such as were occasioned by the vibration following upon startling events abroad, neither continental Europe nor republican North America has got through the year without visible agitations and strong excitement. The map of Europe has been altered, but not by France. Germany, which up to the beginning of 1864 had usually been regarded as among the strongest, the slowest, and the most pacific Powers, suddenly snatched up arms, within a few days of the birth of the year, and, before its close, wrested Schleswig Holstein from Denmark by the boldest and baldest application in modern times of the law of might. Russia has erased Poland from the list of nations, besides depopulating Circassia. England has quietly transferred the Ionian Islands to the little kingdom of Greece. Italy has made only a prospective change; but by the removal of her capital to Florence she has sealed the Franco-Italian Convention, and quietly waits the moment when, by the stipulated recall of the French army of occupation from Rome, the estates of the Supreme Pontiff will drop into her hands, and no part of her soil but Venetia will remain under a foreign sway. The Danubian Principalities, following the lead of Prince Couza, an able adventurer, have reduced the tie which binds them to Turkey to an almost imperceptible thread, and, but for diplomatic restraints, would speedily and openly proclaim their independence. The year just about to be consigned to the sepulchre of the past has seen the initiation of great changes. What year will see the end of them, and what the end will be, the future only can disclose.

Glancing from Europe to the West we also catch sight of stirring events. The erection of a new Imperial throne in Mexico, under the auspices of the French Emperor, and the enthusiastic welcome accorded to Maximilian, the brother of Francis Joseph of Austria, quickens in European minds a reasonable hope that that hitherto distracted country, occupying a splendid position, and rich beyond calculation in its natural resources, may henceforth enjoy the internal security requisite for the development of a peaceful and prosperous empire. On the other hand, the Confederation of the British provinces of America, under one constitutional system and one central Government,—a consummation all but actually completed—warrants sanguine expectations of a flattering future for an empire in the north, built up in a more rugged clime, and with harder and, perhaps, more enduring materials. It is between the two, over the vast space covered by the United States, that the retrospect of the year ressumes its most dismal hues. The close of 1864 leaves the civil contest between North and South apparently as undecided as it stood at the commencement. The re-election of Mr. Lincoln is a popular Federal vote for the continuance of the struggle. Victory oscillates with strange impartiality between the combatants, giving, perhaps, a slight balance of advantage to the North, but scarcely affording foothold for the hope that the war is near its termination. Yet, even here, it is not unmingled darkness. The same national vote that re-seated Mr. Lincoln in the presidential chair determined upon cleansing from the Constitution the stain of slavery; and there can be little doubt that, whatever may be the final issue of the pending conflict, the "peculiar domestic institution" will perish in the awful struggle which it has occasioned.

Revolving now to our own country, the review becomes much more deficient in the elements of excitement. It is not the province to be so at the opening of 1864. Let us be thankful that it was so, for all that. The year came in as a lion and goes out as a lamb. Rumours of war—of war, too, with Germany—disturbed the public mind as an approaching breeze darkens by the ripple which it causes the surface of the sea. Throughout the month of January men were alternately swayed by hope and fear. The secrets of diplomacy oozed out but slowly and by piecemeal; but there were preparations on foot which looked exactly like contemplation of hostilities. The meeting of Parliament suddenly dissipated these apprehensions, but a compromise was made to the country by the Parliamentary leaders of both Houses of the Legislature that the Queen's Ministers had not thought it necessary to advise her Majesty to intimate to between Spain and Germany otherwise than by friendly diplomatic offices. It gave no assurance, but did not divert attention from what the two German Powers were meditating and accomplishing in the North of Europe nor did it abate in any measure the lively sympathy felt in this country for Denmark. The first four months of the Session were mainly absorbed in watching with anxiety and interest the progress of the war, waiting for the meeting and the deliberations of the London Conference, and finally discussing and pronouncing judgment on the part taken in the quarrel by the British Cabinet. The Conference, we are wholly wasted, for out of the frequent vicissitudes, the humiliation, the mortifying incidents, and the final debate to which the Dano-German question gave rise, the people of England collected clearer ideas than ever they had before possessed of the nature of their international responsibilities, and a fuller appreciation of the doctrine of non-intervention.

The legislative fruits of the Session were chiefly fiscal, administrative, and social—the smoke and vapour of the Dano-German quarrel having stifled political feeling in regard to domestic matters. An expenditure considerably below the estimates of the preceding year, a satisfactory retrenchment of our outlay on the Army and Navy, and the surprising recuperative energy exhibited by the revenue under Mr. Gladstone's financial management, put a surplus of £3,000,000 into his hands, and formed the basis of another splendid Budget, of which a small reduction of the duties payable on income, on sugar, and on fire insurance, constituted the prominent features. A useful measure of Sir George Grey, for amending the laws relating to the treatment of convicts, increasing the severity of prison discipline, and largely augmenting the "ticket-of-leave" system, tended to allay the alarm which had been excited during the previous winter months by the frequent and daring outrages committed by convicts too easily set at large before the expiration of their former sentences. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, encouraged by the brilliant success of his financial operations, extended through a scheme, founded upon the same principles, enabling the working classes to insure their lives for small sums, which, by the facilities it offered and the perfect security which it gave, would, it was hoped, foster prudential and selfreliant habits among the people.

While nothing beyond what we have cursorily mentioned served to make the Parliamentary Session of 1864 memorable, the year will live in the recollection of a vast majority of our countrymen as one distinguished by several remarkable events. Who among us will be likely to forget the view of those who, pastures, the dry watercourses, the failing springs, and the blasted aspect of immense breadths of the country during summer and autumn—an all-pervading calamity only mitigated by the occasional fall of the corn harvest! When will the entrance of Garibaldi into London fade from the view of those who witnessed it, or the fervent enthusiasm which his brief visit kindled in the breasts of high and low of all parties be obliterated from the national mind? When will the horrors of the Shrewsbury explosion cease to thrill the heart as often as they are recalled, or the gunpowder explosion at Erith to remind us of our insecurity? Or what likelihood is there that any who have already reached their manhood, on reverting to the annals of 1864, will overlook the murder of Mr. Briggs on the North London Railway, the process which seized the travelling portion of the public, the pursuit of Müller to America his capture, his trial, his confession, his execution? These are incidents the remembrance of which will long be associated with the year just expiring, and, in concurrence with the political events which have shaken Europe and America, will serve to remove it at least out of the category of the ordinary and the commonplace. We shall bid it adieu as one which in passing has witnessed strange things.

We must not close this hasty retrospect without a reverential reference to a few at least of the eminent persons who, during the last twelve months, have been taken from us by death. Two crowned heads have been laid low—the King of Bavaria, and, more closely connected with our Court, the King of Wirtemberg. English political circles have been bereaved of the Duke of Newcastle, whose unimpeachable integrity, untiring industry, robust common-sense, and chivalrous courtesy, might be accounted as an equivalent for brilliant talent; of William Johnson Fox, long member for Oldham; the "Father of the Lobby" of the Anti-Corn-Law struggle; and of the Earl of Carlisle, the genial, the graceful, and the good, one of the most beloved and successful on the list of Irish Lord Lieutenants. Literature has parted with several who had adorned her walls, of whom we mention only two—Lucy Aikin and Nathaniel Hawthorne. We have been called to mourn the death of Captain Speke, the successful explorer of the sources of the Nile. From the Continent the Fine Arts Meyerbeer is gone, leaving behind him a rich legacy in music, which the world will never cease to value; and William Behnes, the sculptor; and Gonsalvi, whose paintings of fruit are never likely to be excelled; and Leech, the fine-hearted and inimitable humourist of the brush and pencil, whose contributions to Punch made fame enough for half a dozen artists. Peace to their memories! Their work is done, and they are at rest. From the last day of the year we look back upon them, and upon many others, of whom they were representatives, thankful for what they did, and hopeful that the impulse of their example in their several vocations will be beneficially felt for many years to come.

THE SOUTH-EASTERN AND CHARING-CROSS RAILWAY WORKS, DOWGATE-HILL.

A short time ago we published a view of the building and other preparations for the construction of the proposed railway bridge across the Thames, by which the Charing-cross and South-Eastern Railway traffic is to have access to the future City terminus of the Metropolitan. The piers and abutments of the bridge are approaching their completion, and the progress made in the works during the present year, more than by friendly diplomatic offices. FRANCE.

A number of persons collected on Tuesday before the reserved garden of the Tuileries, where they could perceive the Prince Imperial taking the air in the branches of an enormous tree. The child was standing by looking at the Prince, who appeared greatly to enjoy the scene. The Prince left shortly after came and skated on the same basin.

The day's Moniteur publishes a note stating that the extraordinary Budget for 1866, which amounts to a higher figure than that of the present year, will be entirely balanced without having recourse to any extraordinary financial measures.

A decree in the Moniteur re-nominates M. Troplong President of the Senate and gives the first intimation of the approaching session of the Legislature.

By Imperial decree the Emperor's Cabinet is thus composed:—M. E. Fleury, Aide-de-Camp to the Emperor; M. Piétri, Secretary of Private Secretary; M. Conti, Privy Councillor, Chief of the Cabinet; and M. Reiset, Sub-Chief.

Several important changes are announced among the staff of the Ministry of the Interior. The service of the press is to be attached to the Minister's Cabinet, and will be directed by the Councillor of State, Pevet, Chief of the Cabinet and Auditor at the Council of State. M. de Maupas is to be appointed Councillor of State, and will receive the Cross of the Legion of Honour as a reward for his services.

A decree in the Moniteur appoints Mr. Dayton to be appointed Ambassador at Paris from the United States, in the room of Mr. Dayton.

The Council of State has been charged to make an inquiry into the many laws in force in France with a view to their modification or abolition.

Wednesday's Constitutionnel publishes an article, signed by M. Aurelien Limayrac, stating that the cancelled letter of the Pope has caused great surprise, and that it is not to be found in the portfolios, and that, if any danger exists, it is in the reaction to which such manifestations may lead. The article concludes by attributing the principles inscribed at the head of the Constitution.

The generous wishes of Christmas benevolence between Baron Rothschild and Emile Pereire has given place to a duel between the Bureau d'Assistance Publique. Paris, an aggregate of head for distribution commencing from the 1,200,000 mark. The Committees having furnished 50,000 kilos. for his share.

In Paris there is a talent for every one. "Théâtre Religieux," where nothing but pieces taken from the Old Testament will be played.

A great political wedding took place in Paris last week. The daughter of M. Baroche, the Senator, was married to the son of M. Gouyn, Auditor of the Council d'Etat. Almost all the Cabinet and the political world were present. The religious part of the ceremony was performed by the Archbishop of Paris, assisted, as is the custom nowadays, by several other curates.

The Palace of Industry destined for the Universal Exhibition of 1867 will be erected on the outside of the triumphal arch of the Etoile, in ground lately given by the Avenue de la Grande Armée and the Avenue de Grande Armée.

The full embodiment of the French army returning from Mexico has arrived in Paris. The force is not very numerous, consisting, in fact, of nineteen officers and 631 rank and file. They are quartered in the Bicêtre, and do not appear to be any the worse for their campaign in the New World.

The Central Society of the Paris Society for the Protection of Animals, the vice-president, Dr. Blatin, announced that he had just received from the Minister of the Interior a letter in which the article of food should be permitted in the French capital. The subject, he said, had been referred to the Council of State for decision; but, in the mean time, the Sisters of St. Vincent de Paul, the Dominicans, distribute every Saturday to the poor one or two loaves, in addition to that contributed by the Bureau de Bienfaisance. The consumption for that meat are so numerous, the hon. gentleman stated, that all cannot be satisfied.

It appears from statistics lately published, that during the year 1863 the number of dead bodies deposited at the Morgue of Paris was only sixty-one, instead of from 200 to 300, as was formerly the case.

The Minister of Public Instruction has addressed to the rectors under his authority a circular, in which he suggests that great advantages may be derived and the public wealth increased by the introduction of additional fruit-trees, vegetables, and plants into the plots of ground which are attached to the 27,000 normal schools of France, for the instruction of the pupils in gardening and the most improved methods of agricultural cultivation. The Minister announces that with that view he has conferred with the Minister of Agriculture, who has ordered the inspectors to visit such schools as may be on their way and give to the masters whatever counsels may be necessary, drawing in a report on the general situation.

SPAIN.

The Cortes were opened on Thursday week. The Queen's Speech states that the relations of Spain with foreign Powers remain satisfactory, except with Peru, "the Government of which State will finally be convinced that justice is on our side." Her Majesty also expresses a hope that a perfect understanding will be arrived at without any stain upon the national honour. The Queen proceeds to state that the official communication of the Archbishop Maximilian's accession to the Mexican throne is of the commonplace nature, and as the political relations between Spain and Mexico, hitherto unfortunately disputed, "The South American republics will see that the sympathy of Spain has no admixture of ambitious projects." The Queen continues:—"The Italian question is still pending, and the revolutionary agitation which has the object of that country has given rise to fresh diplomatic combinations. As soon as affairs are definitively settled my Government will take the question into consideration in the manner dictated by prudence, with a view, however, finally to the respect and filial love which Spain as a Catholic nation professes for the venerable father of the faithful. The speech, in conclusion, announces the introduction of bills relative to financial questions and modifications in the present legislation affecting credit societies. A bill on the press law, in harmony with the Constitution, is also to be brought forward. No allusion is made to San Domingo.

The Bishop of the Asturias has had presented to him an autograph letter from the Rey de Tunis, richly ornamented with diamonds, of the Royal order of Hassan. The letter was inclosed in a purse of gold lama.

ITALY.

Prince Humbert has taken up his residence in Naples, and assumed command of the army in the south. He has issued a proclamation to the city to the Italian troops congratulating them on the bravery and discipline which they have shown in the campaign in the mountains to districts hitherto infested by brigands. The Prince received on Saturday an official visit from Cardinal Andrea, who was received with the honours due to his rank.

Turin telegrams announce a probable reorganization of the Italian War Department, which will have the effect of diminishing the staff of officials and making other considerable reductions.

The King has ordered the suppression of public utility, the occupation of all convents, seminaries, and other establishments in Rome as necessary for the service of the State.

The Diritto of Turin announces that the King has signed different decrees, in virtue of which all the military depôts will be suppressed and the troops will be quartered in barracks and in convents in Cagliari.

Two professors and thirteen doctors of the University of Bologna, having refused to take the oath of fidelity to the King of Italy and to the Statute, have been excluded by Royal decree from the list of 1,276 functionaries.

The Pope has issued an encyclical letter condemning the principal modern errors concerning revealed religion, philosophy, and civil society. The letter, addressed to the bishops of eighty propositions, and re-pointed out to the bishops to be refuted. Among the propositions that certainly should be governed without making any distinction between the natural law and the law of revealed religion. The Pope also condemns that the Church has no power to employ force, or any direct or indirect temporal power. He also declares that the Church has not the right of punishing those who violate her laws, and that there is no hope of the eternal salvation of those who do not belong to the true Church.

A catalogue of errors is appended to the letter.

In another encyclical letter his Holiness grants a jubilee of one month to be celebrated in 1865.

The Pope has received the return to that city of Rome von Meyendorff, the Russian Representative at the Papal Court.

On the night of the 24th inst. a detachment of French troops attacked a band of brigands near Veroli, in the province of Frosinone, and several of them—not, however, before some of the French soldiers had been wounded.

PRUSSIA.

Judgment was delivered at Berlin yesterday week in the long-pending cases of the Poles indicted for high treason for creating a rising in Prussian Poland and aiding that in Russian Poland. The majority of the accused were acquitted. Those who were found guilty only of acts tending to the commission of high treason, with extenuating circumstances. Neither capital punishment nor that of imprisonment with hard labour was passed upon any of the prisoners on whom sentence of death was passed upon ten absent persons and various sentences of imprisonment upon others. All but two, however, were pardoned to save recourse to cause up for judgment hereafter.

TURKEY.

The Budget for 1865-5, just issued, shows the total receipts to be 2,241,190 purses 450 piasters, and the expenditure 3,203,622 purses 185 piasters—leaving a deficit of 962,431 purses or 30,123,843 purses 275 piasters. (The purse is equal to 500 piasters, about £4 16s.)

There is an increase in the foreign debt, which is accounted for by the annuities of the loan of 1854, due in 1874, 1894, and 1914, being caused to the account of the current year, while those of the year A.H. 1275 are likewise carried to the same account. Arrangements have been deferred with the consent of the holders, and not appearing in the account of last year. Likewise the interest is reduced due to the sinking fund on the Eshmi dejeddeh of the fourth issue, which ceases to operate in the current year.

There is also an increase in the Civil List, which is ascribed to the augmentation of salaries and the transfer of wages of the porters and the Imperial Printing Office from that of the Mint.

Under the heading "War," the decrease is 123,869 purses, caused by transfer of various accounts to the Navy, the Artillery, and the Finance; the rest owing to reduction in the department.

Under the headings "Commerce," "Public Instruction," "Bank Account," "Finance," &c., some rise also recorded.

In the Customs there has been a decrease, caused by the relaxation of 1 per cent on the goods exported by the new Commercial Convention, and also by the non-realisation of the estimated receipts of the year.

AMERICA.

The news from New York, to the 17th inst., is of great importance. The Richmond journals state that, on the 15th inst., the General Slocum carried by storm Fort MacAllister, a fortification on the Ogeechee River fifteen miles south-west of Savannah. The fort was only occupied by a garrison of 250 men, and was captured to extend General Sherman's army to communicate with the Federal fleet and consequently the reinforcement of Savannah. A General Hardee, which left Charleston Bar on the 14th inst., had brought to New York a report that Sherman, after eight hours' fighting, had taken the city of Savannah, with 11,000 prisoners; but the Richmond Examiner stated that, up to the 16th inst., the Federal army had made no advance upon Savannah, which was defended by a triple line of works. The railway communication between Savannah and Charleston appeared to continue to be interrupted by the Confederates under General Foster; for the Savannah journals stated that General Foster endeavoured towards Coosawhatchie on the 9th inst. and burned a bridge, but was twice driven back by the Confederates.

From Tennessee, also, there is news unfavourable to the Confederate cause. General Hood, who, in spite of his late defeat, had pressed upon the Federals and shut up their army in Nashville, has, according to Northern accounts, been defeated with great loss by his opponent, General Thomas. That commander reports that he attacked the Confederates, on the 15th and 16th inst., and drove them a considerable distance, capturing from 3000 to 5000 prisoners and from thirty to forty cannon. Another disaster mentioned the defeated General's army, the Federal expedition dispatched from Vicksburg and Baton Rouge to cut off his communication with Mobile having been entirely successful.

The Federal General Stoneman has made a raid in the Confederate Central Breckenridge's rear, and, after capturing Bristol, Abingdon, and Glade Springs, in Western Virginia, is marching towards Saltville.

A naval and military expedition, under the command of Admiral Porter and General Butler, sailed from Fort Monroe on the 12th inst., and was supposed to be destined for Wilmington.

The St. Albans raiders have been released by Judge Coursol, of Montreal, on the ground that the Court had no jurisdiction. The discharge of the St. Albans raiders was held wrong by the law advisers of the Canadian Government, and warrants were issued for their re-apprehension. Stipendiary magistrates have been appointed by the Canadian Government to take cognizance of breaches of international law on the frontier. Lord Lyons has informed the Federal commanders on the frontier to shoot any raiders if they could, to pursue them into British territory if they escaped, and to resort to the British authorities, but to send them for trial by court-martial at New York. Considerable discontent prevails in the counties of the Canadian, and directing the Secretary of State to demand from the British Government a grant for all property and ships destroyed by piratical vessels, have been introduced into Congress and referred to the Committee for Foreign Affairs.

The House of Representatives has passed a resolution to give notice to England of the abrogation of the Canadian reciprocity treaty.

According to the New York Times, the Brazilian difficulty was satisfactorily settled on the 7th inst. The Emperor was immolent in tone; but Secretary Seward's reply is firm and conciliatory, does not indicate the slightest, and expresses a desire that the matter should be fairly and satisfactorily adjusted.

The New York Tribune states that there is a good prospect of the passage through the House of the constitutional amendment to abolish slavery.

INDIA.

The Indian Government has issued a proclamation annexing to the British dominions the lowland territory of Bhootan known as the Bengal Dooars, and so much of the highlands as may be needful to examine the hill passes leading into the new British territory. It was said that great discussions had broken out among the Bhootanese chiefs, whose position quarrel was thought likely to produce fighting, offering any vigorous resistance to the English.

The successful commencement of the actual campaign with the people of Bhootan is announced by a Calcutta telegram received on Wednesday at the India Office. This telegram, which is dated the 12th inst., states that the force of Dalimkote, stationed in a very strong position, has been taken by the British troops, with the loss of only two officers and fifty men, of whom ten were killed by a casual explosion of gunpowder.

Sir Hugh Rose has been thrown from his horse and severely injured.

There is a report that a disturbance has occurred in Nepaul, and that the King's party had placed Sir Jung Bahadoor under arrest.

From all quarters of India there were complaints of injury to the crops, owing to the want of rain.

JAPAN.

According to statements published by the Paris journals, the Japanese Government has signified to the Court of Rome that it had paid by the Prince of Nagato to defray the expenses of the European expedition, and that it demolished the fortifications at the Straits of Simonoseki, and that a port on the Inland Sea shall be opened to European trade.

THE CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.

The Cape mail-steamer, which arrived yesterday week at Plymouth, brings the news that hostilities were likely to break out between the Orange River Free State and the native tribe of the Basutos, under their chief, Moshesh. Governor Wodehouse, to whom a dispute respecting land due to certain native proprietors by the Basutos was referred for decision, had awarded the litigated district to the Free State; but it was expected that the Basutos would refuse to give up the territory, and that the people of the Free State would proceed to enforce the award by arms.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

The Marquis of Westminster has given £1000 to the British Home for Incurables.

The sum subscribed for the testimonial to the Lord Mayor, in addition at the City of London Schools, amounts to above £400. The testimonial is to be in the shape of a silver-gilt cup.

The British Museum will be closed during the ensuing week, commencing on Tuesday, to admit of visitors, in order to allow of the necessary cleaning and rearrangement of the collections.

In Paddington and St. George's, Hanover-square, out of every five of the population there are domestic servants; while in Spitalfields and Bethnal-green there is but one domestic servant to every ninety-five.

A spirited boat-race for £100 took place on Wednesday between Drewitt of Chelsea and Mackinney of Richmond. The race was from Putney to Hammersmith, and was won, after a sharply-struggled race, by the former, who took the lead soon after the start and maintained it to the end, in spite of many gallant efforts on the part of his opponent to overtake him.

It was stated in the Lord Mayor's Court, on Monday, that there had been an attempt to abscond to Liverpool. After the case had been twice remanded, the prisoner was discharged on bail.

The Prince of Wales has accepted the office of patron of the Bethnal Green Working Classes' Exhibition. A meeting of the committee in furtherance of the exhibition was held, last week, in Mansion-house-buildings, Queen-street—Mr. W. Cubitt in the chair. After the preliminary statement by the honorary secretary (Mr. Murphy), resolutions approving the scheme were unanimously carried. It was stated that the number of applications for space are already nearly double those of the previous exhibition, and that the Queen has promised to lend her aid again next to the project.

The fourteenth dinner of the Commercial Travellers' School for Orphan and Necessitous Children took place, on Thursday week, at the Albion Tavern. About 200 gentlemen sat down to dinner under the presidency of Lord Hughenden Duke of Cambridge. The subscriptions announced exceeded £1000. The half-yearly meeting of the governors was held on Wednesday, at the London Tavern. The report stated that in the year ending Sept. 30, 1861, the ordinary receipts had been £3,000, an increase over the former year of £400. The number of children in the school is 102 boys and 107 girls. Nine boys and six girls were elected on Wednesday.

Representatives of the Highland Society of London, the Caledonian Asylum, the Scottish Corporation, the Scottish Hospital, and the Caledonian Asylum met in the hall of the Scottish Corporation last week, and formed a committee to carry out the scheme. The following resolution was unanimously agreed to:—"That it is very desirable to secure a memorial in honour of the illustrious prince of Scotland resident in London, and for other national objects." The meeting resolved itself into a committee for the election of Pupils and for the Potter Exhibition.—Mrs. E. Fell and Miss J. Williams.

Last week the births of 1847 children—947 boys and 900 girls—were registered in London. In the ten corresponding weeks of the years 1851-60 the average number corrected) was 1835.—The deaths in London, which had declined to 1449 in the week that ended Saturday, the 14th inst., again rose last week to 1623. The average number of deaths in the fifty-two week of ten years, 1851-60, is, with a correction for increase of population, 1496. The present return, therefore, exhibits an excess over the estimated number of 127. The deaths from typhus were eighty-four, and they were more numerous than those from any other zymotic disease. Scarlatina was the next most fatal. The deaths from measles were fifty-seven. It is remarkable that bronchitis and pneumonia exhibit directly opposite tendencies in the week; for while the mortality from the former increased that from the latter decreased in an extraordinary degree. In the last three weeks the deaths from bronchitis were 102, 122, and 148; those from pneumonia were 97, 125, and 68. While the deaths from bronchitis were last week 26 above the average, the deaths from pneumonia were 57 below it. Five nonagenarians died in the week. Two women had arrived at the age of ninety-four years, and one at that of ninety-five.

Hitherto the latest time for posting letters at the district and branch offices of the London Post-office was eight minutes before the hour of one pump. The Postmaster-General, however, with a view of affording the public the benefit of the delivery by the second delivery of letters, and to the latest possible time, has issued a notification, stating that arrangements have been made, which will be in force after the 1st of January next, receiving letters for all the night mails at the General Post-office, and at the district and branch offices, up to half-past four o'clock in the afternoon, the fee of twopence; and for receiving at the counter of the several district offices and of the Chief Receiving-office, Lombard-street, up to half-past five, with the fee of twopence, letters to be dispatched to the country from the railway stations adjacent to such district and branch offices respectively. On and from the same date the fee for receiving late letters at the General Post-office between the hours of five and six o'clock in the afternoon, and for the delivery of the dispatch of the trains, will be reduced from 6d. to 4d.; and the time for receiving letters at the General Post-office up to half-past five o'clock in the afternoon, before paying a late fee of 4d., will be altered from 7 p.m. to 6.45 p.m. In all cases the postage, as will be seen from the above, is to be prepaid by stamps affixed to the letters.

The proposed bill for the protection and improvement of Winkfield-common has been printed. The preamble recites that the common has been the resort of gipsies; that it is ill drained and unfit for pasturage; that rights of common exist in certain parts of it; and that it is expedient, provided that the National Rifle Association have the use of it from the 1st of the month of June in each year for the purposes of their meetings, that the title of the common as a public park; that provision for the expenses of such approval be made out of the rates; that the common be vested in the Crown; that the expenses of the works should be divided—viz., part of the cost leading from the Ascot-road to the Rifle-butts to be paid by the Crown, and the remainder by the county. The site of the windmill on the north side of the common is to be reserved to the Crown, with ground.

The largest pushing of the season was that of 21st ult., at the Bank of England, when 3000 persons were admitted at Mapledene. At St. Pancras penny subscription among the inmates was made for Christmas-day, and only 2s. 6d. was given to each person, under the Mrs. Morrison, in recognition of her kind and considerate treatment of the inmates. Another feature in the Christmas festivities was the annual paint stock, were open, but scarcely any customers attended, arrangements having been made for the holidays. The theatres and other places of amusement were crowded with pleasure-seekers; and in the evening the theatres were filled to overflowing. Many of the gin-palaces and taverns in the East-end have given the outlines of there time-honoured extravagances in the accompanying Engraving.

LAW AND POLICE.—An action was tried in the Court of Queen's Bench on Thursday week, in which the Maharajah Dhuleep Singh was plaintiff, and Mr. Oldfield, a solicitor, was defendant, for the seizure of servants, Alfred Singh. The plaintiff had been a subject of India, and was supposed to be under the influence of Hindoo superstition. The servants had been fancied the other servants treated him with studied disrespect, and he left the house in a huff, and went to live with Mr. Oldfield. A writ of habeas corpus was refused to him on the ground that he was of full age, and he then commenced suit to recover. The jury expressed a wish to see the plaintiff, and he was brought into court and examined by the learned judge.

Mayor Lowry, a retired Indian officer, was charged at the Mansion House, on Thursday week, with assaulting Mr. L. Beckwith, a member of the firm of which Mr. Desborough, a member had, it seems, been attending to a matter of business connected with the municipal improvements. It had some difficulty appears to have arisen respecting the bill of costs which the gallant Colonel had rendered to the firm, and on the occasion of which the Mayor and his friend, Sir John Lowry, with a letter to Mr. Desborough asking him to call upon him. Mr. Beckwith, however, called instead, and as the Mayor replied to a threat to give him a sound and wholesome dogwhipping, whereupon an assault took place, which terminated in the complainant's favour itself. Mayor Lowry admitted that he had sent the challenge, but denied the complainant's version of the affair. Mr. Beckwith was bound over to keep the peace, when the Mayor, who conducted his own defence, whilst admitting the fact of the challenge, but denying that he intended to fight a duel, expressed his sorrow and endeavoured to show that he had been greatly provoked. The Lord Mayor said that he had no doubt that the Mayor was sorry for what he had done, but that, relieved him in the mean time on bail.

At the Guildhall on Monday a charge of bigamy has been made 20s. and fast-making in a carriage of the Great Northern Railway.

In a fire which broke out on Tuesday week at Ipswich, saffron-hill, on Monday night, an Italian named Pollard stabbed four Englishmen, two of the gang-system, and the other two severely wounded. The principal sufferer, one named Harrington, was taken, but he would not sign the paper, observing that he "would not be a party to hang a man." Pollard was fully committed on Tuesday. Pollard is in custody.

At the Coroner's Court, Shoreditch, on Monday an inquest was held by the Coroner on Tuesday. Mary Hall, aged sixty-four, who had been a pauper in the Bethnal-green Workhouse, and who died from the effects of exhaustion from hunger, refused to make known her wants to any one, even to her own daughter, who had been in the habit of supplying her mother with food, as she was unable to help her. There could be no doubt that the poor old woman preferred to die rather than ask charity.

During the last fifteen months over 5,000,000 dols. have been paid over to the treasurer of the United States by Marshal Kepes, of Massachusetts, on account of sales of lands confiscated from rebels, and there have been adjudicated at Boston.

The Times is led to say it has been observed for some time past, by those who have the privilege to approach the Queen, that her Majesty was gradually losing the power of her former command of nerve, however much the great sorrow is always present to her, nevertheless the Queen is now more able to control her feelings, and to converse calmly on the most painfully painful, but also to the general sometimes and social surroundings of the Royal Home.

The Emperor and Empress of the French, a few days back, visited, at the sale-rooms in the Rue Drouot, Paris, a fine collection of Chinese porcelain vases, &c., which had been brought from the Imperial summer palace, General de Goyon, the Marquis de Caux, and M. de St. Arbin, Librarian to the Emperor, had the charge of the purchases. The sale comprised 1000 lots of collection. At the sale, which took place on the following day, a rectangular flower-stand, supported by two kneeling Chinese warriors, assembled, with the exception of the heads and hands, which are in bronze, gilt, was knocked down for 11,250f.; two pieces of furniture, in black wood, each surmounted with twenty-three plates in enamelled porcelain, realised 8000f.; a table, decorated with a mosaic of precious stones, and with bronze feet forming lacquer, with gilt ewer and high handles, was knocked down for 6000f.; two white elephants in enamel, 2400f.; an octagon perfume-burner, with gilt cover, 4800f.; a gourd, having on each side a medallion with a landscape, 3020f.; a bell, with a flat cover, having the form of a horse, 2980f.; a pair of vases, with covers, 2000f.; and a pair of vases, with covers, 1800f. At another of the same period, 1700f. Her Majesty is said to have been the purchaser of some of the finest articles. The sale produced 85,000f.—Galignani.

Last week one of the children of Mr. Joseph Bothington was found alive and well in the Nantwich Union Workhouse.

The Bradfield reservoir, the cause of the Sheffield inundation, has been examined by Messrs. Bateman, Hawksley, Bateman, Fowler, and Harrison, experienced engineers, and their report on the cause of the calamity offers confirmation to the commonly-received opinion. They think there was no fracture of the pipes, nor creep of water along the outside, and that there was no imperfection in the quality of materials or workmanship in the embankment. It was owing, in their opinion, to a landslip, and they mention many circumstances to prove the correctness of their view.

Mr. Henry William Ferdinand Bolckow, a member of the firm of Bolckow and Vaughan, ironmasters, to whose energy the town of Middlesbrough already owes a considerable proportion of its progress, intends giving to the inhabitants a park and public walk, at a cost of £20,000. It is to be completely laid out as a public park, at the expense of the donor. The property, which contains 25,000 square yards, is bounded by roads, and by factories, mills, furnaces, and other works of the great iron industry, where, it appears to have been purchased.

The apparent abandonment of the proposed national memorial at Stratford-on-Avon and the growth of the local fund at their disposal have led to the formation of a Shakespeare Club, which appointed a committee to reconsider their scheme for a permanent recognition of the poet's memory. The committee have decided to offer two scholarships of £50 a-year, to be held alternately by the Free Grammar School and the Queen's College, in honor of the poet, during four years' residence at the latter, under equal terms, for the foundation of two or more scholarships for the study of literature, history, or law, in one of the institutes open to men.

At a meeting of the Stockport Mechanics' Institution last week, Mr. Watkin, member for the borough, spoke of the effect of such associations in doing away with the antagonism between class and class. He conducted in his early days it was thought in the circles in which one had acquaintance to be a disgrace to belong to a mechanics' institute, and in connection with legitimate lines and in fairly politics were not exactly the proper set to connect with literature and science, but that feeling was happily positively abominable. All that was now gone. We could not now go into any circle in which there was not a Mr. Fellow who would not be ready down to his fair share of the world's work, even in the very class to which he had referred, viz., that of the working men. He (Mr. Watkin) was personally accosted to those who sustained themselves by honest labour. A few days ago he had the honour of receiving a deputation from that place, and the second son of one of the best, kindest, and ablest members of the House of Peers resident in Ireland. The deputation came to ask him to preside at lunch, another young man the son of an eminent clergyman, and others connected with the best families in the neighbourhood, and all working men in the country. He was happy to say, also—and it caused him a great which he could not describe—that one of the deputation was a Mr. Bamford, a basket-maker and chief in hand, during his fair share in the mechanical work of the world, and who was one of the most distinguished of those humble men. In most say that work was becoming respectable. It was an old phrase, which we owed to some great writer, that labour was the law of nature. Even the Cattle had translated it "Labour is Worship."

An explosion occurred on Thursday week at a fall of sand at the mouth of a tunnel at Bogworth, on the Midland line, killed two men and imprisoned several others for a considerable time. A large number of men were set to work to remove the sand, and the night but for advanced before the fallen mass was cleared away. The two unfortunate men who were unwise had been steadily pursuing their work in the tunnel all the time. The men had been at work about a week in the tunnel, and it was supposed that proper steps would be taken to liberate them, and as they could do no work in the tunnel, they were employed at the mouth in filling the trucks. More than 200,000 tons of earth had fallen at the mouth of the tunnel. Two days, some of the imprisoned men had been taken out alive, and the making of the ice on a piece of water at Crookes, near Sheffield, on Monday. Mr. Wm. Hall, aged nine, and Brighton, on Monday morning, a man named Combe deliberately shot a labourer named Shaw, who died instantaneously.

The two convicts Hall and Brady were executed at Stafford on Tuesday week for the murder of his own daughter, and Brough for the murder of an old man who lived in the same house with him. Mr. Sergeant Hill, who subsequently protested his innocence to the last, but the evidence given at his trial precludes the supposition that he was the victim of a judicial error. A woman named Baker was condemned to death as an accomplice in his crime, but her sentence has been commuted. Frances Wood was executed on Wednesday at Chelmsford for the murder of a woman named Hurst, with whom he formerly lived, and who had given birth to a child by him. Wood was born in Somerset two years ago, and was executed, and there of her crew was a very large crowd. The Sailors' Home Institution afterwards took off, and succeeded in saving the whole of the Ballard's crew.

AN INDIAN WITH A FLAG OF TRUCE, IN CLAYOQUOT SOUND, VANCOUVER ISLAND.

CONFLICT WITH THE INDIANS OF VANCOUVER ISLAND.

THE British squadron in the North Pacific Ocean, commanded by Rear-Admiral the Hon. Joseph Denman, has lately been employed in chastising the Indian tribes of Clayoquot Sound, on the west coast of Vancouver Island, for some acts of piracy committed by them. A small vessel, named the Kingfisher, was seized by the people of the Ahousat tribe, plundered, and destroyed; they likewise murdered the captain and crew. When this news came to Victoria, the capital of Vancouver Island — the squadron being stationed at Esquimaux Harbour, which is near that town — Admiral Denman sent the gun-boat Devastation, Captain Pike, to demand that the murderers should be given up to justice. The Devastation went, but returned without success. Admiral Denman then set forth in the Sutlej, his flagship, on the 1st of October, and on the next morning arrived off the entrance of Clayoquot Sound, where the Devastation joined company. In the afternoon they went in, the Sutlej proceeding up the North Arm and the Devastation up the Herbert Arm. We are indebted to Lieutenant Edward C. Hall, of the Sutlej, for the sketches from which our Engravings are made to illustrate this affair. One of them is a portrait of the Man Friday, an Indian of Barclay Sound, employed as interpreter by Mr. Hankin (formerly Lieutenant R.N.), who was surveying in these waters with H.M.S. Hecate a few years ago. Mr. Hankin, with his Man Friday, accompanied the Admiral's ship on this occasion, and landed at the first native village they reached, in hopes of persuading the Indians to come to a parley or "waw-waw." But the village was deserted by its inhabitants, and some of their canoes were hidden away under the bank: these were immediately brought off. A party of Indians of another tribe, under their chief, Cedar-Ka-Nim, then joined the Sutlej as allies, and with them, probably as a spy, was one of the Ahousats. He was at once made prisoner, and gave corroborative evidence as to the names of those who had murdered the crew of the Kingfisher. The Sutlej, having steamed up as far as Obstruction Pass, returned down the North Arm and stopped in front of the village where it had been before. A native was seen there vehemently gesticulating as the ship drew near to the shore, and exclaiming, probably, at the loss of the canoes. Mr. Hankin and his Man Friday again landed and approached this man quietly, without exciting his alarm, but presently made him a prisoner, believing him to be one of the murderers, and brought him safe on board.

In the mean time the Devastation had been up the Herbert arm of the Sound, but with no better success than the time before. The Admiral, however, determined to make one last effort at conciliation. He sent Friday in a canoe to a village in the Herbert Arm, inhabited by the Ahousat tribe, requesting that the guilty persons and the stolen property should be given up. After a "waw-waw" of nearly two hours they sent back a refusal to give up either. The Sutlej then came in and opened fire upon the village, which was soon knocked to pieces; but, to ensure its total destruction, Lieutenant Talbot, with boats, was sent in to set the huts on fire and bring away the canoes. In a few minutes the village was in flames and eleven canoes were towed off to the ship, the Indians firing but a few shots at Lieutenant Talbot's boat. A large winter encampment of the Indians was destroyed on the next day.

After this, the operations were stayed until Oct. 7, when preparations were made for landing the smallarms company and the marines, accompanied by the friendly chief, Cedar-Ka-Nim, and some of his tribe. This party, with Mr. Smith, the Superintendent of Police, were to march across a neck of land three miles in width, so as to get to the rear of the Indian village on Trout River, Cypress Bay, where Capcho, the chief of the Ahousats, had established himself. At six o'clock next morning they accordingly landed, under the command of Lieutenant H. Stewart, the senior Lieutenant, and, guided by the Indians, marched, with some difficulty, through swampy ground and thick brushwood, intersected by mountain streams, to the shore of Cypress Bay. Here they found the boats of the Sutlej ready to give their assistance, drawn up in the position shown in our second Engraving. The Sutlej had been brought round to this side of the promontory, while the Devastation still lay on the other side; and rockets were thrown up, as a signal from the one side to the other, to announce the success of the landing party. These saw no sign of Indians till within half a mile of Cypress Bay, when smoke and the noise of chopping wood indicated the neighbourhood of the village. The blue-jackets, under Lieutenant Maxwell, were then placed in ambush, just outside, to intercept any of the Indians who might try to escape by the river-side; while the marines, divided into two parties, silently advanced into the village. The barking of the dogs, however, soon betrayed their approach, and a complete surprise was thus prevented. They made a dash at the huts, but the Indians were too quick for them, and every dwelling was found empty. In another moment a war-whoop was raised in the surrounding cover, and a sharp fire was opened on every side. This was, of course, returned, and with some effect, ten or twelve of the Indians being killed; but the rest of them got away, leaving our men in possession of the village.

On the following day the Admiral, having decided to send another message to see whether the Ahousats would yet listen to reason after this exhibition of force, the two prisoners on board the Sutlej and Devastation were released, and, furnished with some blankets and tobacco, were dispatched to speak to their people. In the evening they returned, with two more of their tribe, and said that they would assist in delivering the murderers up to justice. It is, therefore, to be hoped that this quarrel may be settled without further bloodshed. We have not learned how many of the attacking party were killed or wounded; but it appears that thirteen of the Indians were killed at Cypress Bay and twelve on the former occasion in the Herbert Arm, an inlet of Clayoquot Sound. The frequency of outrages and disorders on this coast is a subject of the more regret, as it is notorious that the white man himself is often to blame when the Indian takes the law into his own hands. The appointment of a Government agent, a man of character and intelligence, well acquainted with the Indian language and customs, to whom they might appeal in disputed cases, would perhaps obviate the necessity for any hostile action in future.

AN INDIAN FAKIR, OR MUSSULMAN SAINT.

THE extraordinary figure delineated in our Engraving is the reverend Wuseer Alee Shah Mulung, a well-known Fakir, or Mussulman saint, residing at Hoshungabad, in the Central Provinces of India. He is also the caretaker of the Mushir Bagh, a public garden in the suburbs of that city, pleasantly situated on the banks of the Nerbudda River, and remarkable for its fine large trees. An amateur photographer, Captain Ducat, of the Bombay Staff Corps, has sent us two portraits of this strange-looking person. The one which we have engraved shows his wonderfully long hair, which trails about two feet on the ground as he stands upright, hanging down in curls as thick as a man's thumb; the other portrait, taken at a different time, represents him with his poggeree gathered in snake-like coils around his head—this poggeree consisting simply of his own hair, with a single fold of muslin over it. The devout and pious Fakir of Hoshungabad is greatly venerated by the disciples of his own faith.

RECENT DISCOVERIES IN THE BURIED CITY OF POMPEII.

DURING the last three or four years, since the misrule of the Neapolitan Bourbons was superseded by the kingdom of Italy, great progress has been made in the task of bringing to light that abundant store of curious relics of antiquity which had remained for eighteen centuries buried in the ruins of Pompeii. The extent and importance of these operations, carried on under the direction of Cavaliere Fiorelli, with the advice of Signor

STATUETTE OF SILENUS.

Niccolini, the highest authority upon the subject, have been acknowledged throughout Europe by the students of Roman history and the connoisseurs of classic art. The Illustrations which we have engraved are selected from a large collection of photographs placed at our disposal by the Rev. James Fletcher, of Newburyport, Massachusetts, author of a treatise on the remains of Pompeii. One of our Engravings presents a general view of the most recent excavations, showing that part of the ancient city which has, within the last year and a half or two years, been laid open by the zeal and energy of the new Administration. It had been supposed that the most important locality for the excavations of Pompeii was that which lay around the Forum, and which was explored and minutely described some fifty years ago, the general opinion being that none but private houses of an inferior class would be found elsewhere. The latest discoveries, however, prove that some of the buildings richest in artistic decoration, and otherwise most interesting, are to be found in the quarter which is but now thrown open to modern research. Among these we may particularly notice the house of Cornelius Rufus, an interior view of which forms the subject of one of our Illustrations. The usual features of Roman domestic architecture, as in other mansions of grandeur and rich men at Pompeii, may be easily recognised in this example. Here is the impluvium, or shallow basin, to catch rain-water, in the centre of the open court around which are disposed the private chambers of the family; the bust of Cornelius Rufus himself, on a pedestal inscribed with his name, is seen beyond. The sculptured griffins, or monsters with rams' horns and claws, are characteristic of the grotesque style of decoration imported into the Roman Empire from its Asiatic conquests. A marble slab laid across here would form a table. The other two Illustrations we present in this Number belong to a higher kind of plastic art. They represent a pair of bronze statuettes, each about two feet in height, which have been found in different places among the ruins of the buried city. That of Silenus, bearing a tray on his head, is thought to have been a lamp-stand. It is remarkable that it shows the serpent and other Egyptian emblems. The figure of Narcissus has been greatly admired for the grace of its proportions and the anatomical correctness of its forms, more especially apparent in the back view, which is displayed in our Engraving.

want of reflection and good taste, the thoughtful and respectable portion of English society has at present no belief that the Government of Washington contemplates a crime.

Assuredly we have no intention of meeting swagger by swagger. We are not inclined to boast of what we could do if a rupture should take place. The American Government knows this as well as Earl Russell does. Canada would at first suffer, especially if the new war should be conducted in the spirit in which certain of the Northern generals have acted towards men who were the other day fellow-citizens of those who now ravage the Southern districts. England herself is rarely herself at the outset of war. But who doubts the issue? The Union would at last come to the end of its resources, and then the Confederacy would be followed by the pouring through its harbours, whose blockade we should go through as through paper, such armaments as would speedily turn the fortunes of the war, and, aided by the re-invigorated and vengeful Southerns, we should sweep Federalism from the South in as swift a Napoleonism from the Peninsula. And we should soon place Canada in a position to lurl back the invaders, no matter what early successes they might have gained. But it is undesirable to dwell on possibilities which we hope and believe will never arise. Assured that the American Government comprehends the whole question, and assured also that the better portion of the people in both countries would deplore the wickedness of a needless war, we would leave the disagreeable question which has just arisen to the solution of honourable diplomacy.

The year of the last great triumph of the British Naval arms. We are imperfectly informed as to the exact position of General Sherman, but there is reason to believe that Savannah has fallen. He had certainly stormed and taken its ill-manned but gallantly-defended fortress. Fort M'Allister. The rest of the account is but rumour, but we have no reason for thinking the rumour correct. At all events, after a very masterly display of strategy during his "retreat," by menacing one enemy and another, and bewildering all, Sherman has made his way to the sea, and is in communication with Admiral Dahlgren's squadron. Of the details he has not heard, it has been formidably besieged. We are informed, however, that its defences are strong, and, supposing that it has not been seized at a coup-de-main by Sherman, his work may yet be heavy. We also hear that General Thomas has added his name, more and more, to the roll of those who have shown that he has struck heavily, routed the valiant but not overskilful Confederate leader, and captured many prisoners and guns. The last advices left him about to follow up his blow; but this sequel is not always one in which the assailant is successful. Still, "victory" is nevertheless implied here. The Wilmington expedition has also been dispatched at last, and the description of the armament is very imposing. Wilmington would be a far more valuable acquisition than Savannah, and both sides are well aware of this, and will make proportionate efforts. But, taking the whole state of the case into account, we do not think the successes of its other armies are won only by desperately hard work and frequent and fierce fighting. We are strangely misinformed as to the resources of the South if the exhaustion of which we hear so much has not yet begun to manifest itself.

Setting entirely aside the irritating topic which has newly arisen, treating as spiteful bluster the menaces of some of the Federal organs, and refusing to believe, with others, that the Chief of the Union is planning treachery, we unhesitatingly crave for the explanations which we hope will be made on behalf of the better classes in England—namely, that we earnestly desire to see the Americans at peace. We trust to close our record of the in-coming year with an allusion to the conclusion of the most hideous and irritant war hitherto noticed in history. Such a still more hideous and irritant war may succeed it we have too much faith in a superintending Providence to believe.

THE ROMAN REMAINS IN CHESTER.—At the second monthly meeting of the Archæological Society, which was held on the 5th inst. a paper was read upon the remains of the Romans in Chester, with a detailed description of the discoveries recently made in the Roodee. The lecture was copiously illustrated with drawings, procured expressly for the evening. In opening the meeting the President said he regretted very much to see this lecture the more because the discovery has excited a very large amount of interest in the city. Considerable excavations have already been made, and before the Society of Antiquaries, in January last, by Mr. W. H. Wilding, a most valuable paper was read. This gentleman was able to give a slight historical sketch, to show what it was that induced the Romans to settle in Chester, and what was the original size of the present site of Chester, followed by a brief glance at the 20th Legion. He then described the Amphitheatre, and the discoveries which have been made by a detailed description of everything that was discovered. The lecture was illustrated by a plan of the Roodee, showing the exact position of that great prætorium, the Chester rows. In speaking of the origin and the city walls, Mr. Wilding said, although it was impossible to state the first founding of Chester by the Romans, yet in probably such a place as Chester, with its river and harbour, it was the first point of operations forming a large intrenched camp after the military system adopted, the shape of which depended on the nature of the ground in the present day. In regard to any doubts as to Chester being the Roman Deva, he thought there could be no doubt on the subject. Richard of Cirencester said that Chester was the Deva of the Romans, and Ptolemy's description of the site of Deva corresponded exactly to that which Chester now had. The walls of the Roman remains he stated had not been built in one piece. After describing the towers he said that not a little was visible in the shape of Roman remains, as the walls, with the exception of a few towers, some have been removed to the Water Tower and Bonewaldesthorne's Tower, and the latter was not Roman in its original site, they are now practically obliterated. In their original condition they were of the most massive character. The foundations were solid, and of precisely the same construction in general, as exhibiting some peculiarities, as existing in other parts of Britain; and, moreover, they were of the same era in other parts of England, and, moreover, they were of the same construction as the Roman walls of Rome, and of the other principal cities of the then existing Americans, one of whose principal delights was visiting the Roman walls. The walls were composed of two external and irregular rows and remains of just now which they do not possess in their own land." The paper then went on to examine the remains in detail, first noticing the manufactures in clay—such as plain tiles, patellæ, box-tiles, cylindrical tiles, hexagon tiles, and tile tombs. Passing on, it took into consideration Roman pavements, including not only the doors of residences, but those of courtrooms, offices, and the streets. Then came a notice of the inscribed pavement, the various shapes and colours being described, and specimens of them exhibited. Dr. Bruhford continued by stating that at the next meeting he proposed to describe Danish masonry in Chester, and after that the Saxons. He would then refer into the question as to the character of the building—whether it was, at Mr. Tite said, a public building or not. He (Dr. Bruhford) thought it of a public building, whether it might not have been a series of public baths.

CHURCH AND UNIVERSITIES.

On the vigil of St. Thomas the Bishop of Winchester consecrated the chancel and burial-ground of St. Peter's, Bournemouth.

On Saturday week the first stone was laid of a new church, to be dedicated to St. Andrew, in the eastern division of the Camden district, Camberwell. The site of the church is in the Sevenoaks road, near Pen Hill-street, and there will be accommodation for more than 800 persons.

The Bishop of London has appointed the Rev. Charles Wordsworth, Fellow of St. Andrew College and Student of Christ Church, Oxford, and the Rev. W. F. Hobbs Knollys, M.A., of Merton College, Oxford, Rural Dean of Hackney, Hants, Rural Dean, to be two of his Chaplains.

The Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol has returned to the Rector of Cricklade, who offered it until the beginning of February last, the restored parish church of Cricklade was consecrated by his Lordship yesterday week.

The third annual festival of the Church Missionary Society was celebrated on Thursday week at Trinity, by a sale of fancy-work and a large Christmas-tree. The Rev. Dr. Bickersteth, Rector of Trinity, also contributed principally by the juvenile members of the English Church. The sale realised about £1000.

The late Mrs. Hill Morgan, of Cheltenham, bequeathed £4,000 for the erection of a new church at Coventry, and as a fund the interest of which is to be employed annually in the relief of the poor of the district in which such church shall be situate, and £1,000 to the three largest bequests to sundry charitable institutions in the neighbourhood of Cheltenham.

Christ Church, Deptford, was consecrated by the Bishop of London on Tuesday week. It is a spacious and substantial edifice, with plain pews sittings for 1200 or 1300 persons; and, according to the intentions of its deed, is to be "free and unappropriated for ever to the poor who live in the immediate neighbourhood thereof, and who shall resort to the same for the service of the work of the Home Mission.

The Lord Chancellor has recently been presented to the following clergymen:—To the Rev. H. O. Kendall, from his parish, on the occasion of his resigning the benefice of Ashton-under-Lyne, Lancashire; To Archdeacon to the Rev. D. Wadeson on his resigning the canonry of St. John's Ludgate; to the Rev. R. G. Barlow, on his resigning the canonry of Christ Church, Bermondsey; to the Rev. J. R. Vernon, M.A., on his resigning the canonry of Bridge Street, Hereford; to the Rev. Edward Hill, Rector of Hanbury, Worcestershire; to the Rev. Geo. Salmon to the Rev. E. C. Colloni, by the present and future regius professorship of the Ecclesiastical History.

Ordinations were held on Sunday last by the Archbishop of York, the Bishops of London, Winchester, Carlisle, Chichester, Ely, Hereford, Rochester, Lincoln, Norwich, Oxford, Peterborough, Rochester, Salisbury, and Worcester, and 295 gentlemen were admitted to holy orders. Of these there were:—Of Cambridge, 1; Dublin, 1; Durham, 1; Queen's College, 1; St. Bees College, 12; Trinity College, Dublin, 2; St. Aidan's Theological College, 1; Chichester Theological College, 1; Lichfield Theological College, 1; Birmingham, 1; Lichfield Theological College, 1; Lancing College, Sussex, 1; Church Missionary Institution, Islington, 1; Highbury College, 1; Battersea Training College, 1. The following are the preachers appointed by the Bishop of London at the approaching Lent Morning Services, which begin on Sunday next (to-morrow) at St. Paul's Cathedral:—Jan. 1, The Lord Bishop of London; 8, Rev. James Moorhouse, Vicar of Leeds; 15, Rev. Thomas Jackson; 22, Rev. W. W. Champneys, Canon of St. Paul's; 29, Rev. H. T. Lydon, Student of Christ Church, Oxford; 31, Rev. C. Lake, Rector of Wonston, Hants. Subdeacon—The large open space under the dome of St. Paul's Cathedral has undergone some alterations, and the seats have been removed to make room for a choir. Preparations are being made for filling the eight spandrels formed by the groins of the dome with mosaic, representing subjects from the New Testament, designed to represent the Church Militant crowned by a blaze of golden light and surrounded by angels, corresponding to the Church Triumphant. It will be sought in process of time to render the interior of St. Paul's not in point of richness and beauty to that of St. Peter's at Rome, with which its exterior challenges comparison. Eleven of the principal windows of the dome are filled with stained glass executed, we believe, by Professor Saxdorf, of Dresden, and Mr. Pearson, the cathedral surveyor. Four of these have been completed, and the remainder are in progress. The cost of painting two is borne by the Drapers' and Skinners' Companies, and of two others by the Fishmongers' and the Iron Trade Companies. Each of the panels bears a suitable inscription for the general adornment of the Cathedral, and the subjects selected are, for Prudence, St. Peter; and for Justice, Dorcas.

"THE QUEEN'S HIGHWAY IN THE SIXTEENTH CENTURY."

To appreciate rightly our fine-art illustration for this week we must refer to a quotation which the painter has appended to the title of the picture engraved. The quotation is taken from a letter of Maud Ufford to Margery Paningtun in D'Eyncourt's "Memoirs of the Maids of Honour," and runs thus:—"The journey was marvellous for ease and expedition, for such is the perfect evenness of the new highway, her Highness left the coach only once, whilst the hinds and folk of a Shire-town filled it on with their pates." So, then, to have the extremely rare luxury of vehicular conveyance—indeed, it was needful before the invention of steel carriage springs, and some two centuries before the Macadam mode, at Bristol, had begun the paving and mending of the Romans—to have, we say, locomotive aid in the form of a coach and to become finely embedded to the axletrees in mud, "only once," on a short journey, was considered in the "merrie England" of the days of "good Queen Bess" something so wonderful that the solitary misstep here recounted seems to have been regarded almost as an argument de rasgnes relieving its monotony; and the post of mine ary-thing but a Maid of Honour to Queen Elizabeth, for even to mention the ruts, and now traps forward, under a lowering, watery sky, no wise discouraged, surprised, or angry, followed by her laughing maids of honour, and leaving footmen, hinds, and assorted attendants to extricate the coach. To us, however, who live under another good Queen, and who have inconsiderately been spoiled by our ways, at least as regards road and rail, what a number of reflections are awaked by this Sixteenth-century highway! Inconsistently we exclaim, if this was a "new highway," and considered "perfectly even" in spite of the old and uneven ones have been like? Nevertheless, much was done in the sixteenth century towards the improvement of roads. The good work was begun in the reign of Mary and continued in that of her sister. Under Mary it was that the first time compact was made to publish should maintain its own roads. Previously it had depended very much upon the convenience or caprice of particular proprietors whether there should be any roads at all, or any traces left of the old highway or bridle-track. Under the feudal system the peasant was bound to the service of his holding to and in certain roads, and the lord of the land, or his lord's bay and corn, to repair his bridges, and to mend his roads. As abolition of this service and, in the sixteenth century, transferred from the lord to the parish or district, and the charge of repairing the highways and bridges fell upon the copyholder.

To realise the state of society all through the "dark ages," and even as late as the sixteenth century, is to us extremely difficult. For during those long centuries no means existed of which we have any record whereby the noble, the diseased and ruinous, vis of the Romans. Of the turbulence and dangers of all kinds which attended travelling, even in the days of one of our grandfathers, the stories are rife. "Stand and Deliver" will have a vivid idea. Under the centralising influence of Imperial Rome, as an illustration of the state of society and of communication, by magnificent causeways, from the wall of Antoninus, to Southern Britain, and thence to Jerusalem—a distance of 4080 Roman miles. In medieval times, on the contrary, we have to go to few memorable tracks and paths radiating from the isolated castle or enfeebled town, and close contact was a matter of necessity. In the modern times there were violent prejudices against the extension of metropolitan roads, and the railway system, similar to that which opposed the construction of railways. Among many other apprehended objections, it was thought that the interests of those near the capital would be injured. As an illustration of the state of the metropolis of public events travelled in the roads of the sixteenth century, it may be mentioned that of his holding to and in existence of which was known in some of the remotest parishes of Devonshire until the carriers of Queen Anne's time were mourning for her. A history of road would, in fact, be to a great extent a history of civilisation.

There is another and peculiar interest in the passage quoted by Mrs. Hayliss. It is not known whether or not the "new highway" of Island, the first mention of Queen Elizabeth herself having used a coach. Whether or not close carriage was a luxury in vogue, it was just introduced into England. The pattern of the coach in this picture is, however, probably of a later date. The first British Sovereign who had a state carriage was Charles I.

Although we reviewed this picture on its exhibition last season at the Royal Academy, we cannot refuse leave of it on the present occasion of warm praise for its originality and its fresh and extremely pleasant colouring. It is now on view at the Winter Exhibition, under the management of Mr. Pilsbury, in the Egyptian Hall of the Institute of Painters in Water Colours, 53, Pall-mall—an exhibition which has received several important additions since its first opening and which, continuing, as we have learnt it does, a large number of works contributed by themselves, is well deserving encouragement, and will well repay a visit.

Large quantities of mistletoe have been imported into Paris during the last few days for the London market, during the past month.

The mother of the late William Makepeace Thackeray died at Kensington, widow of Major H. C. Smyth, of the Indian service, died on the 24th inst.

An iron pot filled with gold coins, of the period of the Spanish rule in Flanders, has just been discovered by some workmen buried in the ground near the Louvre Gate at Antwerp.

It is stated at Rome that Mr. Pope Hennessy, M.P., has refused from the Papal Government the concession of the recently projected railway from Rome to Trivoli.

M. Victor Hugo has given his customary Christmas fête to the poor children connected with his family at Guernsey. This is also up the occasion, in which he explained the advantages of the practice.

The Royal Library at Berlin has made a valuable addition to its autographs by purchasing a collection of 17,000, which were the property of the late Baron von Meusebach.

Prince Couza has opened the Roumanian Senate and Chamber of Deputies in person, and delivered a speech which is stated to have been greatly applauded.

An old actor, Louis Kramer, recently died at Geneva in a singular way. He was playing King Lear, and in his excitement swallowed a portion of his artificial beard, which stuck in the windpipe and caused his death.

M. Lecomte, historical painter, who married a sister of M. Meyer Vevey, has been ordered by imperial decree to the town of Versailles before his own, and to call himself for the future Vernet-Lecomte.

In the Vienna papers it is said that an English company has purchased a large piece of land near the Danube for the purpose of laying the ground in question—the so-called Brigittenau—was a few weeks ago offered to the municipality of Vienna for 800,000 fl., which, on the refusal of the latter, is about £80,000. It is said that the company will construct docks in the Brigittenau.

CHRISTMAS IN PARIS.—The Morning Post Paris correspondent, writing on Christmas-eve, says:—The appearance of the Exposition is such there is much to be found reminding us of Christmas time in England. We have only to glance at the windows of the shops of the principal Parisian objects congregate in Paris have learnt what to offer. Magnificent selection of most beautiful articles in each department, and especially in jewellery, the cattle shows and scientific feeding are visible in all the butchers' windows, and the fat pigs and oxen are the pride of the day. Everywhere throughout the city Swiss clothed with fat to an extent which baffles all the contrivance of art, and scarcely looking like a biped under the load of meat they bear a turkey of huge proportions. In the pastry-cooks' windows you see the Christmas cake, and in the wine shops the bottles of wine are encased in pasteboard to protect port and sherry, ale and porter, seldom old brandy, and curaçoa and the like, we might be walking about the streets of London instead of the Boulevard St. Honoré, so much is there to remind us of Christmas at home. Nothing will be wanting to the Christmas of English people who are only beginning to learn that the Continental holidays, seven days of which are given to Christmas, are not to be spent in church, the Episcopal Church, the Wesleyan Church, the Congregational Church, the Baptist Church, and, a recent English Church, that of Catholic Church. In all these places of worship divine service will be performed to-morrow. English chemists are advertising, too, for the good things we are more with everyone. British Christmas dinners are also publicly announced. Mr. Hill says, at his establishment on the Boulevards, on Christmas Day will be found the usual good old English fare—roast beef, roast turkey, roast sucking pig, grouse, plum-pudding, mince pies, &c. Every a French man dining of stocking pig and plum-pudding! Another benevolent tradesman advertises "Christmas trees," and adds, "All kinds of small wax candles, century, balloons, toys, beads, gilt nuts, &c., for decorating out-and ornamental Christmas trees in the English and German style." Christmas tea, and tainted residence all to be had in Paris. Really the retail British may make himself very comfortable to morrow.

ECHOES OF THE WEEK.

A DEAF, fire challenge to fight a duel has been sent this week by a retired Major in the Indian army to a lawyer in Surrey, Bentley, Esq. The lawyer wouldn't fight, but he caused his would-be antagonist to be arrested and brought up before the Lord Mayor. The arrest took place, appropriately, on Boxing Day. Retired Majors ought to be made to understand that to send challenges or to fight duels is entirely contrary to the whole spirit of English society, and that the law will have no mercy upon those who defy one another to mortal combat. The gentleman who sent the challenge, however, seems to have erred only in the way of temper. He should have quarrelled with the lawyer about twenty pounds, and fancied that his had been not only wronged but insulted. India is a hot country, and many Europeans have passed the flower of their lives in that burning clime are not particularly famous for their temper. Let us hope that the ends of justice would probably be met if the Major, who is committed for trial, were brought to a jury recognizances to keep the peace; but there must be no mistake about the matter. Colonel Fawcett by Lieutenant Munro put a stop to duelling in England, and the example set by the Queen's cousin and Major Yelverton ought absolutely persist in attempting to revive a wicked and barbarous custom.

One more carte de visite of Alfred Tennyson. We do not complain of everything, for the last portrait is an excellent one. It comes from the studio of the clever photographer, Mayall, and is a very pure and noble effigy of the great English poet. By-the-way, has it struck anybody that Tennyson and Dickens are extraordinarily alike—a resemblance which Charles Dickens and Alfred Tennyson. There are some in this latest half-length of Mr. Tennyson. Only a few days ago Mr. Watkins striking vignette head of Charles Dickens. It is not alone the features which are similar, but the head, the hair, and the moustache are physiognomically brothers. "The strong marking of the nose," as Mr. Tennyson's friend Coleridge says, "is the line about the mouth—But we are trenching on dangerous ground. Let us turn to Mr. Mayall's facts. They set him self for venturing to remark that a distinguished author was "dying" when he was only "sleeping."

Talking of Mr. Yates, his novel of "Broken to Harness" is said to be selling very satisfactorily, and of its literary merits we have nothing to say—it sells. We have a horror of puffing anybody—especially a friend, and, as Edmund Burke says, "the devil" and of ours, we have a double reason for not puffing him. Moreover, we have not read Mr. Yates's book. We have, in fact been prevented from so doing by a reason which is as "Echo," that "Broken to Harness" is spoken of as "Mr. Yates's last story," which, of course, means that, on the occasion of "Barbara's History," which we mean to read after we have finished "George Geith of Fen-court," and the "Doctor's Wife." What a season of novels here for the holidays we are in! Mr. Trollope seems to be all bent on bringing out three-volume batches of fiction. He is still "Orley Farm," and "Rachel Ray" is not yet finished, and "George Geith" and "Broken to Harness," while as yet we have never opened a line of "Linkstrune Chase" or of "Our Mutual Friend." Our modern novelists are indeed a fine body of men. We like them, but, to keep au courant with their productions, their readers need have no sinecure.

An intelligent gentleman has written to the papers to point out the difficulty of reading the names of the streets of London on a dark night, and to suggest that the simple remedy would be that of painting the name of the street on the glass of every gaslamp as it is the case in Paris. We have often ourselves suggested this and similar improvements. It is also asked why reflectors should not be inserted in the tops of the lamps, so as to disseminate the light in different directions. As it is, and with the exception of the new and magnificent factory state, they give but a dim and uncertain glimmer. These suggestions are not new, but we believe that they are. We have also the names of the streets on the lamps, why not point them thereon in black letters? Again, why not, as in Paris, have a little blue eye-facet cut in a moment that he is at 32, Blucher-street, or at 17, Bluchcr-street, or at 112, East Thirty-second-street. The reflectors ought certainly to be introduced, and the names of the streets painted might be made in street nomenclature, in the stringent abolition of the intricate and the vulgar. Cabestone-street, Piccadilly, is a fine street, and Great Swallow-street Regent-street; why should not Johnstreet, Edward-street, Portman-square, Baker-street, Portman-street, John-street, Oxford-street, to Circus-street; King-street, Goldensquare, to Golden-square, or to Silver-street); and King-street, Cheapside, to Cog and Magog-street?

"Eldes Aides!" This mysterious announcement has been puzzling the public for the last three weeks. Everywhere we see "Eldes Aides invited," and "Number Seven," and the other said multifarious announcements. We have heard "Eldes Aides!" We know now what "Eldes Aides" means. It is a very clever option, which a correspondent per cent cleverer than the gilded trick—by means of which material change can be effected in the appearance of the human face and figure from the spot. Mr. Joseph Maurice, of Langham-place, is the inventor, and "Eldes Aides" is the name of the entertainment at the evening management of Her Majesty's Theatre as an additional attraction to the pantomime. But the public little know how very near they were losing "Eldes Aides" on the Night of Nights. At the last moment the advertising management had kept the clever invention a profound secret to the public, and the public was nothing if not curious. Speculation was rife in the streets—the thought of the delight and astonishment which would be created by "Eldes Aides" at the night rehearsal on Christmas Eve. The time for unveiling the mystery approached. The public would have it, a small little boy, with a pantomime mask on, walked right into the Queen's Theatre, and asked for "Eldes Aides." Whether this entertaining management tore its hair, or beat its breast, or whether it did not, the little boy was innocent; it was the property (with the pantomime mask on) in the lowest depths of the Haymarket floor. We are not informed; but the investor and his satellites must have been in a hurry to work with a will to get "Eldes Aides" was as right as ninepence, and amazed a crowded audience on the night of nights.

There is a gentleman with one leg who is now dancing at the Theatre Royal, Drury-lane. There is another gentleman, likewise "unjointed" (may we thus translate the French?), at the Royal Covent-garden. So the two great temples of the Drama have only one pair of legs between them. The Drury Lane gentleman's name is Toscano, the Covent Garden's one Donato; but the latter is the more celebrated, for he has only one foot (pray observe the singular number) before he was in chrysery, first exhibited under the monopoly in the hopping. Donato is a very agile dancer, and in the manner in which he manages to get on with his one leg and the solitary limb fit it assumes the guise of a spiral staircase covered with red cloth, and then he revels himself, as Mephistopheles, in the trapdoors. We fancy that we can remember a maimed soldier who, with a child of a comfort and bayonet, used to go through the unusual exercise of "Cut and Thrust" at the Surrey Theatre, under Mr. Osbaldiston, and brave Sir Thomas Trowbridge, who, in the Crimean, refused to be carried off the field, although his left leg had been cut off, on his forcible passages. It is curious, in any case, to know that the feat performed by the "unjointed" gentleman of the day has been known for two hundred and thirty years ago. We have an old etching, by "the noble Andreas Calloi," in which, among the Caprarottes, the Scevolines, the Diavolines, the Mezzettines, the Scaramuzzas, the Zobolos, the Pinacrattapes, and the Pulchinos of St. Marks Place, we find a one-legged gentleman, who is described as "Il Donato" among the Ambulatorii Phasmatoppe college who so lamented the death of Grimaldi.

Reference was made in this column last week to the fact of circulars having been issued containing the names of persons, used without their leave, as members of a committee to test the performances of the Davenport Brothers. On this head we have received the following note, signed "H. D. Palmer, Manager for the Davenport Brothers":—"On behalf of the Messrs. Davenport, I beg to disclaim any knowledge of or any power whatever bearing your name or the names of the gentlemen you mention in your article of last week. There be some paper in existence, neither I nor the Messrs. Davenport know anything of it, nor had it been issued at our desire or with our consent."

GIFT-BOOKS.

IT is of no use to cling to the past; it is of no avail to sing "Oh! the days that are gone!" however sweet and however bitter they may be, or may have been, it is caught at last by the high priest Christmas, it is decked with wreaths of holly and mistletoe, it is solemnly sacrificed on the altar of Good Cheer, and it is buried at last in the recesses of memory. But the spirit of Christmas abides with us yet, and beneath his influence we are "good to it." We greet the coming of the "glad New Year" with pledges of friendship and tokens of love: like to these which accompanied the departure of the old. The days of hospitality are still open; and the gift which is more than presented to father and mother, sister and brother, wife and child, relation and friend, is the book. Hence we direct especially drawing attention to a few more books, in addition to those noticed in our Christmas Number, which are peculiarly adapted to donative purposes.

Foremost amongst them stands Mrs. Bury Palliser's History of Lace (Sampson Low and Co.). There is not much to be said—and in saying that the work is worthy of its subject; for lace in its manufacture requires patience, delicacy, delicacy, and patience, and when it has been brought to combination is a pliable specimen of elegance; and Mrs. Palliser's volume has evidently been prepared with delicacy, patience, delicacy, and skill; and in its complete form, with its handsome binding, its beautiful paper and print, and its exquisite illustrations, is a highly embellishment of grace. Nor let it be supposed that Mrs. Palliser has undertaken to write a history of that which has attached to it little or no interest. Philosophers may sneer at her theme, but in the name of brides, babies, business, and all that is charming in woman's eyes, what can be more interesting to the feminine mind than lace? From the day when the slender fingers of Arachne are fabled to have wrought a fabric which rivalled with jealousy whose inscribed Athene, so that the goddess rent the fabric in pieces and the maiden herself in a paroxysm of despair, lace, or its prototype, embroidery, has been a favourite pursuit with the daughters of Adam and Eve's mothers. It is probable, indeed, that Mrs. Palliser has made a happy hit, and has supplied a want which no book has yet been supplied, and has satisfied a yearning continually but half unconsciously gratified. Lace, in fact, has long desired something midway between sacred and profane literature—something neither wholly heavenly nor wholly earthly; from which they might derive entertainment in hours of leisure, and from which something congenial to their confabulation and in harmony with their aspirations; some book to be placed on drawing-room tables; something to lie continually upon the boudoir-table, or to be left on the pincushions the companion of their pillows. Dr. Milman's "History of Latin Christianity" might not be answered these purposes, but "A History of Lace" would seem to be the very thing. "To every good boy," as the old saying is, "a good penny;" and to every refined mind, and, though the cynic to whom the remark was addressed retorted that "it rather ought to show, the possession of much refined gold," who would not side with the lady against the cynic? Moreover, should there be any unchristable persons who look upon lace as an appendage to vanity, and therefore to be avoided, let them be convinced by the reasoning used by a believing wife to convert an unbelieving husband, when the latter was urged to purchase some exquisite old lace, sarcastically reminded his wife that Christian ladies were enjoined to "adorn themselves, not with broidered hair and with gold, or apparel, but as women professing godliness with good works;" whereupon the lady promptly replied, "It is the very best of economy to buy lace, for it is a thing which will call three hundred pounds for six yards of that lace dirt cheap." Furthermore, lace, as an article of industry, deserves a history, and from that point of view Mrs. Palliser's elegant production is entitled regarded as far more than a gift-book, as a book to be read for solid information and thankfully studied. The handsome is, or has been, the sister-in-misery of the shirtmaker, whose will be remembered until Rood is forgotten; and the lacemaker's fall, servitude, diseases, and unceasing ill-pay are not to be passed over unnoticed by Mrs. Palliser. The history is useful also as an index of the dingy and dirty lace-rooms of one over the other age. Forgery, so far as lace is concerned, appears to have wellnigh vanished from our men; dukes, and millionnaires, and the like fade away, for all we know to the contrary, and their coronets, if not bedecked with lace; but, for the most part, men, both as wearers and as workers, have forsworn lace which was the glory of women in a men's ornament—the women. The number of anecdotes which Mrs. Palliser has introduced into her volume will be sufficient to recommend it had it not those other claims, already mentioned, upon our gratitude and attention. The chapter upon smuggling (p. 231) is particularly interesting. We know the genius of the Foreign lace let the highest personages into lawlessness and caused indignities to be offered to princes, with the "Duke" at their head, "the body of his Grace the Duke of Devonshire was brought over from France, where he died, the officers, to the anger of his servants, not conduct marching the coffin with the hearse, poked the corpse with a stick to ascertain if it was a real body; but the trick of smuggling coffins was not new, for it had been practised before. When a deceased clergyman was conveyed from the Low Countries for interment, the relatives of the deceased used to have disappeared and to have been replaced by Flanders lace of immense value—the head, hands, and feet alone remaining." So much for the honour due to the dead when in the hands with the profits or vanities of the living. Mrs. Palliser truly says that "the art of lacemaking has, from the earliest times, been associated with that of needlework, it would be impossible to enter on the subject of the present work without giving some mention of the latter." She, therefore, commences with an allusion to "the first industrial act of our mother Eve," and goes steadily through the stages down to the machine-made laces of the present day. The chapters on "Point lace" are own quotations, and say

> (et vous demander de la dentelle),
> Voici le taille de Bruxelles,
> La bonne, la vraie, la jolie guipure,
> Et la Malines, si légère;
> L'appellerons-nous point coupé
> (Qui se fait à Paris, dit-on);
> Et la Valenciennes, si belle,
> Et voici la Valenciennes,
> Le point de France et même le point de Paris;
> Bref les dentelles
> Dont on fait des dentelles
> Que seulement tous les jours;

and not only the newest but also the most ancient laces are treated of in order of coming, meaning of what is called the Italian laying claim to "the invention of point or needle-made lace" and the manufacture of Flanders, France, England, Germany, Switzerland, Denmark, Sweden, Russia, and ending with England and Scotland. Such is the contents of the book.

Stories for Stories (Strahan and Co.) may fairly claim a place amongst gift-books. It consists of two pretty volumes, the elegant and legible appearance of which is enhanced by what is probably the author's sex. The contents neither thrill the nerves by reason of sensational incidents nor stimulate curiosity by excess of plot; but they have much that is readable, learnable, digestible. The title is an outcome of the fact that the stories are the narration of characters which might be introduced and developed in a long novel. The "Stolen Treasure," however, and perhaps, "Emily's Ambition" may be considered rather complete cases than "Stories for Stories;" but they resemble the "studies" in so far as a moral and religious bias is given to them. Wards in Trouble (Nisbet), Ready Money (Hall, Virtue, Hall, Virtue, (Houlston and Wright), wheeled the latter (by Emma Jane Worboise) is contained in the former, are respectively a year's collection of periodical articles upon all manner of subjects (including biography, chess, Christmas games, croquet, crinoline, and needlework), and a tale with a good purpose. Both volumes are illustrated, but the literature in each appears to us of a higher order than the illustrations. Worth her Weight in Gold (Macintosh) is the title of a neat little volume, containing a story of which the burden is, "that a good servant is worth her weight in gold." A Mrs. Petworth enunciates this opinion and to nuptials upon March, the good servant, the truth of it, presents that fulsome domestic, not with a few hundredweights of gold, but with "a handsome bride," which everybody: Maria appears to love accepted in silence. Cookham and Careers, by Mrs. R. I. Greene (Smith, Elder, and Co.), is a short tale relating to and adapted for children. Its object is to improve the young and to show them how "careers" may be changed into "coshions," which is a dark saying, but which appears to be used by grandmammas when naughty girls are changed into good ones. Tales of the Outposts, by Captain A. Wyndham (Saunders, Otley, and Co.), is a second edition, illustrated, of certain "adventures in the wild regions of Southern Africa," which will, no doubt, be read with pleasure by boys and others to whom stories of hunting and its concomitants are a delight. It may relieve anxious and inquiring minds to remark that "the outpost is the leading piece for the wargame." The Child's Own Book of Scripture Pictures contains the "chief scenes and events of Bible history, properly arranged and adapted for the delight and instruction of children." It is remarkable for large paper, large print, and large and striking illustrations. It is published by Mason and Co., who also send forth, for the entertainment of boys, Mr. James Greenwood's Adventures of Seven Years' Service, which is enlivened by illustrations designed by the pencil of Mr. H. S. Melville, engraved by Vizetelly. Acceptable to very many readers will be the Poetical History of Mercy, Love, and Truth, and of Sin, and what he did and sae and is; and not less acceptable will be Daddy's Medicine; each contribution to infantine amusement being quarto, thickly-printed, copiously-pictured, and freely-illustrated.

America, even in this her hour of civil war, manages to send her quota to make up the tale of amusing publications. The Life of Corporal Christian Bullock, beautifully illustrated by John A. Howe, A.M., Richmond Hospice, and others (New York: Appleton and Boston: Crompton Low, Son, and Marston), is a very handsome and presentable volume; and Forest Pictures in the Adirondacks, a collection of sketches penned by Alfred B. Street, profusely interspersed by John A. Howe (New York; James G. Gregory: London; Sampson Low, Son, and Marston), is a graceful combination of pen and pencil. With Pope's "A youth of frolics, an old age of cards" and Burke's "the dark backward and abysm of time" is associated the memory of many pleasant hours afternoon as well known as these. Their juxtaposition depends, of course, upon a mere verbal resemblance, and not upon a rational connection of their meanings; yet since the former is usually died with the same subject, designated by the same word, it will afford at least a pleasant intellectual amusement to trace out the sentences with each other, as a stimulus to desultory thought. A copious index, particularising every one of the sentences quoted, makes this book very handy for reference to the "familiar words" of English literature.

The Life-boat: A Tale of our Coast Heroes. By R. M. Ballantyne, (James Nisbet and Co.) The author of several popular stories of adventure by land and sea, appears to upgrade in the present volume. He has taken up in this volume a subject most congenial to his powers of graphic narration—the exploits of our brave life-boat men on the perilous British coasts. Mr. Ballantyne, we observe, has had the communication with Mr. Richard Lewis, the zealous secretary of the Royal National Life-boat Institution, by whose aid he has been furnished with the most copious and accurate information regarding the facts upon which this interesting tale is founded. We can but hope that the author may receive support townsmen, on the one hand, will be inspired with a noble emulation of the prowess of Guy Foster, Bax, and Young Holland, and, on the other hand, that people, under the same influence, like Mr. Denham, the merchant in Redwharf-lane, City, will not be slow to become liberal supporters of the institution which, for the succour and benefit of our sailors, whose cause, in this matter of provision against the risks of shipwreck, we have always recommended.

THE STUART PAPERS IN THE ROYAL LIBRARY AT WINDSOR.

Mr. Woodward, the Royal librarian, has sent an interesting communication to the Times, respecting the treasures of the Royal Library, which, as two collections, known respectively as the "Cumberland Papers" and the "Stuart Papers." The first consists of letters, &c., collected by William Augustus, Duke of Cumberland, the victor at Culloden, and uncle of George III., and relates to the affairs of England and Europe during the reign of George II. The other consists of a series of letters, documents, &c., many thousands in number, collected by the exiled Stuarts, containing the secret history for the history of England during the last century, and particularly for the period between 1716 and 1776, when the last hopes of the partisans of the dispossessed house were abandoned. The papers have been arranged in chronological order, and a calendar is being made, for the use of students desiring that, if possible, this calendar should be printed for general use; and that as soon as the papers are in a condition to be examined, which will require more specific information than the calendar could give, they should, under the proper restrictions, be made accessible to them. In the course of this work many documents of great interest have fallen under notice, and, among others, some relating to the secret history of the Pretender followed (the young Pretender) to London in the year 1759, and to his profession of Protestantism. Two of these were shown to the committee, and the whole of them having been submitted by Mr. Woodward to the notice of the Queen, her Majesty has been graciously pleased to make them publicly known, considering them too valuable a contribution to the records of the history of our nation at that time to allow that the calendar should be published. Among the papers are the following fragments, which are in the hand of Lord Stanhope (the historian), and are in the Old Pretender's own handwriting. They do not illustrate the political genius of the Prince, they show, like most thinks, that he was negatively strong in his profession of Protestantism. They come among the numerous scraps of paper on which he was accustomed to scribble memoranda of conceivable kind:—

English, Irish, and, to finish,
Scots as thieves Cant be my Vocis.
I hate all priests, and the regions they run in.
From the pope as from the devil, good Lord deliver us.

And to this he has added a couplet from Rochester's well-known poem, which similarly illustrates his being a "Republican":—

I hate all Kings and the Throne the eat on
From the first Caitiff of France to the Cully[sic] of S (otland).

"Vice versâ at present," he adds, which seems to show that he appreciated the difference between the wretched Louis XV. and such a man as Henri IV., who certainly were vice versâ to Louis XIV. and Charles II., to Rochester's time.

On the eve of New Year's Day, 1863, the sixty-sixth annual publication of the Post Office London Directory claims a passing notice. This volume, which has grown to some 2000 pages, in so many years of its existence, is the Postmaster-General's Directory, which Messrs. Kelly are bringing out, over the signature of the publication of the Londonder Directory. The publication is continued by the publication of the Londonder Directory.

A prospectus of petitions for private bills, deposited on or before the 23rd inst., has been printed. There are 305, being 91 beyond those of the present year. From a former return, issued by the Board of Inquiry, that the number of plans deposited at the private bill office by the end of last month was 1040, which did not vary much from 1000 for the previous seven years to twenty-three folio pages, and contains the names of the Parliamentary Agents for each bills. In the Session of 1861 the number of petitions was 764, and the number of local acts passed was 328. There are 324 bills at present, for the forthcoming Session, and of these 305 are for new bills and 19 are old bills.

The life-boats of the National Life-boat Institution have been saved during the present year 426 lives from various shipwrecks, in addition to the contributions to the saving of thirty-seven vessels by which those lives were saved, during the same period, by shore-boats and other means from different wrecks on the coasts of the United Kingdom, for which the institution had granted rewards, thus making a total of 692 lives saved from various wrecks in the year, mainly through the instrumentality of the National Life-boat Institution. For these joint services the society has granted £1500 in rewards, and twenty-two honorary acknowledgments, including silver medals and votes on vellum. The number of lives saved either by the life-boats or the institution or by special exertions, for which it has granted rewards since its formation, is 14,200; for which services eighty-two gold medals, 742 silver medals, and £19,250 in cash have been paid in rewards. During this year the institution has expended about £11,770 on its various life-boat establishments on the coasts of England, Scotland, and Ireland; and since it has established more the institution has expended £120,000 on its life-boat stations.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

There is nothing new in the racing world, save the announcement that no one need apply for a subscription to Bess Allen, as the thirty are all taken up already. There will then be 1,000 gs. to set off against the £7500 purchase money, which is, we believe, £1000 more than was paid for Blair Athol, the best horse that ever ran in the colours of Dundee. St. Albans and Underland will all be on their trial next season, and we shall also have a glimpse of the Kettledrum, Trumpeter, and Tiramasby yearlings. Macaroni and Adventurer go to the stud, and so the thing runs on. Magnum died lately, of inflammation, at Ormsby yesterday. Of the cricketing news of last season Trumpeter was the most successful, as he had seven winners out of eight, and nearly doubled the stakes won by Orlando.

The past was quite a season for high-priced yearlings, as fourteen of them, which were sold at 700 gs. and upwards, averaged 843 gs., and three, two of which were by Stockwell, 1117 gs. The highest price, 1550 gs., was given for La Dauphine by Stockwell at her Majesty's sale, and Mr. Merry's colt by Newminster, the winner of this season, for the brood mare Theodora; and Mr. Blenkiron made 830 gs., and 700 gs. for Mr. Merry's colt by Stockwell and Mr. Cartwright's filly by Newminster, out of Miss Agnes. The Hall, one of the Cantab's Silkworm litter.

Melton Mowbray and Leicester are very full of hunting men just now, the former being full the first set in. Such days as Dec. 5 from Bunny, Dec. 6 from Bilton, and Dec. 13, seldom fall to the lot of a pack in a season. On the following day Mr. Fernie had a field of fifty minutes with the Duke of Rutland's from Croton covert, and finding at once, they ran their fox over the Belvoir grass country and a half up to this date; and the Duke of Beaufort's, who's often hunt six days a week, fifty-five brace and a half. The Old Berks have in two days killed a brace and a half more than the Cantabs at the beginning of the month, in which they brought two foxes to book, forty-five miles from each end, and one of them was thought to have long be remembered. Peter Collinson has also shown a great share of sport in Cheshire, including a fine thing of one hour and twenty five minutes from Mr. Ellis's, in the Vale of Clwyd, in twenty-five minutes on Dec. 15, the fox getting to ground in both cases. With the exception of the Vale of Clwyd, the frost has, we hear, not stopped by the frost, and snow six inches deep. Sir Watkin's hounds, which have had their share of sport since the frost set in, went out, are stopped from the same cause. The Pytchley braved the intense fog and frost one day, and had a capital thing, with the best of the run in the second season, but the Quorn have not furnished them with a capital two hours and a half, when it froze so hard some fifteen minutes after that one scarlet stayed with the master and Moulton were shot at the close of last season) has been constantly with them. The Quorn "difficulty" is, we believe, now said to be removed, and the harriers hunt as usual.

Pelican's colt, Bonnie Scotland, is well and sadly since "Deerfoot" left, had a little "revival" on Monday, at Hackney-wick, in a two-mile race between Mills and Brighton. The former gave sixty yards, and won, by 15 yards, in 3 min. 57 sec.

The transported offenders now in French Guiana amount to 6021; exclusive of 1,000 who have completed their sentence and, as liberated prisoners with a fixed residence assigned to them, 614; colonial prisoners, 1,000; free persons, 1,000; children born in the colony, 1,000; women, 192. The Government, in 1852, selected Guiana as a place to found a penitentiary establishment, according to the provisions of the decree of Dec. 8, 1851. Transportation at present does not comprise any but the convicts condemned to hard labour, and who have undergone part of their ban, and colonial prisoners of African or Asiatic origin. The offenders transported to Guiana are all those condemned to hard labour, except those for good conduct have obtained concessions of land, which they cultivate for their own profit, and which they are legally entitled to sell after a delay on the banks of the Maroni. The Government, thinking with reason that capacity to work is the best means of reformation, has given to the convicts a number of female prisoners disposed to marry. The system has hitherto been a failure, and transportation to Guiana has not been reformatory; moreover, grants a free passage and pecuniary assistance to such families of convicts as may wish to join the prisoners at Guiana, so I many have availed themselves of the favour.—Galignani.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

The dealings in all English securities have been of a moderate scale; nevertheless, the Consol market has ruled very firm, and the quotations have had a upward tendency. The United States loan is commanded very little attention, and prices have ruled rather slightly declined, although money for commercial purposes has become somewhat easier. The Bank of England has received a number of applications for gold, but the demand for the Bank itself is to be limited—about £60,000 of the sovereigns have been delivered.

THE MARKETS.

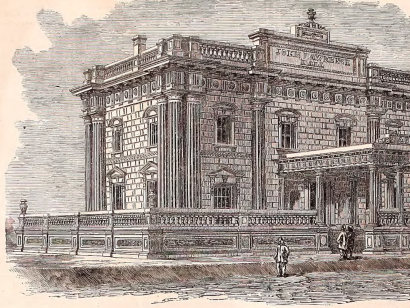
CORN EXCHANGE, Dec. 20.—The supply of English wheat in Mark-lane was limited, but most of the samples remain in hand on good conditions. Most kinds change hands slowly, yet not at lower quotations. Foreign wheat is in moderate request, and fine numbers command extreme rates. Barley is in fair demand, and the turn dearer. Fine malting qualities are in moderate request, but not cheaper. There was a fair inquiry for grinding barley, and prices were supported. Malt is in good request, at steady prices. Beans

THE EMPEROR OF BRAZIL.

THE EMPRESS OF BRAZIL

THE EMPEROR AND EMPRESS OF BRAZIL.

HIS Imperial Majesty Dom Pedro II., Emperor of Brazil, whose Portrait, with that of his consort, the Empress Theresa, we give above, is justly esteemed for his personal qualities and accomplishments, as well as for his loyalty and integrity as a constitutional Sovereign. We find in the Rev. J. C. Fletcher's recent account of "Brazil and the Brazilians," the testimony of a foreigner twelve years resident in that country, who had occasional opportunities of witnessing the Emperor's zeal for literature, science, and art, and the respectable proficiency which he has attained. His Majesty, we are told, presides at every meeting of the Brazilian "Imperial Geographical and Historical Society;" and it has been by his direction that geographical explorations have been made in the important province of Ceará, and also, in 1862, of the River Purus, one of the largest affluents of the Amazon, which is really more unknown than the Nile. It may be remembered that, at a meeting of the Royal Geographical Society of London, some weeks ago, the Emperor was, on the motion of Sir Roderick Murchison, elected an honorary member of that society, to which he had sent, by the hands of Mr. Fletcher, a copy of a costly volume, with maps and illustrations, printed at his own expense, giving a minute description of those researches. The Historical Society of Massachusetts has paid him a similar compliment. He is said to possess some skill as a topographical surveyor and engineer, which he has shown by his designs for the building of bridges. He has likewise devoted much time to the study of chemistry in his laboratory at São Christovão; and his general acquaintance with the physical sciences was remarked both by Lieutenant Strain, of the Darien expedition, and Dr. Reinhardt, the German naturalist, in their conversations with the affable and enlightened Prince. He is tolerably familiar with the languages and literature of England, Germany, France, and Italy, and has a special partiality for the poetry of Longfellow, as he told an American visitor one day. Prince Adalbert of Prussia, in his book of travels, speaks of the Emperor as an amateur painter of no mean skill. His Majesty is thirty-nine years of age, a handsome, portly man, whose stature is several inches above six feet. He is much beloved for the frankness and gentleness of his manners. The Empress, a daughter of King Francis I. of Naples, is one year older. They have two children, one of whom has just married the Comte d'Eu, a son of the Duke de Nemours: the other is also a Princess.



THE INDIANS OF PERU AND BOLIVIA.

THE native Indian races of Peru and Bolivia—forming in the last-mentioned country at least three fourths of its total population—may be divided into those who speak the Quichua language, dwelling along the coast and in the Valley of the Desaguadero; and those who inhabit the eastern declivities of the Andes and the plains beyond. The latter consist of a number of tribes speaking different languages. Some of these have adopted the Christian religion, wear a light cotton dress, and practise the mechanical arts; while others still go naked, roving through the country in search of game or fish, upon which, and the wild plants or roots of the forest, they chiefly feed. The Portraits of those who appear in our Engraving were sent by Mr. C. L. Rowsell, photographer, of Valparaiso; and they evidently belong to the half-civilised part of the native South American population. It is said that in Bolivia their numbers are rather on the increase than diminishing; that they still cherish their traditions, which promise an ultimate recovery of the land for their own nation. An Indian of pure Aymara blood, when drawn by conscription in the forced levies of troops, will refuse to serve the existing Government, or, if he serves, will be disgraced in the sight of his own people and disowned by his nearest kindred. The independence which the Aymaras will fight for, if ever they rise, is not the independence taken from them by the Spaniards, but that which they lost when conquered by the Quichuas, who, under their Incas, in their turn were subdued by the Spaniards. Many ruined buildings or monuments of Indian origin are found in Bolivia and Peru; but the Quichua or Inca ruins are poor and rough compared with those of the Aymara people. The Quichua ruins consist mostly of adobes, or sun-dried bricks; but those of the Aymaras are of beautifully-wrought fitted stones covered with hieroglyphics, and existing in places to which they must have been brought with immense labour, as no similar stones are to be found for leagues around. All the Aymaras can tell us now is, that their forefathers were great and rich and powerful, and placed these great stones where they stand; and then that they were conquered by the Quichuas; but who those forefathers were, or what their history, they know not.

INDIANS OF PERU AND BOLIVIA, SOUTH AMERICA.

LAWRENCE HALL, LAHORE, FOUNDED IN HONOUR OF SIR JOHN LAWRENCE.

FRENCH MOUNTED ZOUAVES.

THE last mail from Vera Cruz brought us the Sketch by M. Beaucé, which we have engraved, of the mounted Zouaves now employed by the French in Mexico as contre-guerrillas. This innovation, which has proved most successful, is due to Marshal Bazaine, who is fully aware of the requirements of the country, in the pacification of which he is engaged. It is well known that the vast territories of Mexico have been constantly infested by guerilla bands, spreading desolation and ruin in every direction. In order to disperse or destroy these bands the French officers organised companies of contre-guerillas for the pursuit of the brigands over mountains and through valleys. The idea of the creation of a company of mounted Zouaves has now been put in execution. The little corps of Zouaves Montés, together with a detachment of Chasseurs d'Afrique, under the command of the brave Captain de la Hayrie, were sent, early in November, on the track of the band of the famous Crescencio Morales, which they overtook and destroyed after a sharp combat, the brigand leader being killed in the night encounter of the 13th of November. The guerrilleros had twenty-eight men and twenty-eight horses killed, and a quantity of arms and accoutrements was carried away by the victors to the hacienda of Tuxpan, where they arrived on the 16th of that month. This novel troop is composed of volunteers from the 3rd Regiment of Zouaves, and, as at present constituted, can get over a considerable distance of difficult ground in a comparatively short time. The Zouaves do not fight in the saddle, but dismount when they approach the enemy, leaving in a body the docile mules that carry them without fatigue through the rough country infested by the guerrillas. Our Engraving represents the mounted Zouaves on muleback and otherwise, which form such a novelty in the French Mexican army.

THE LAWRENCE HALL AT LAHORE.

As a sequel to the Illustrations in our last Number of the visit of Sir John Lawrence, Governor-General of India, to the capital of the Punjaub in the middle of October, we now give a view of the Lawrence Hall, a building erected some years since in the city of Lahore to serve for the public accommodation, and at the same time to form a monument of that distinguished man, who was then Lieutenant-Governor of the province. Here, on the 17th of October last, the present Lieutenant-Governor, Sir Robert Montgomery, entertained the Governor-General at a conversazione, which was attended by most of the civil and military officers, with their wives and daughters. A concert of excellent music was provided by a number of amateur performers, after which the company sat down to supper in a large tent behind the hall. Here the health of Sir John Lawrence was proposed by the Lieutenant-Governor in the heartiest terms of old friendship—as having been his schoolfellow at Londonderry forty years ago—with a just eulogy of the public services and abilities of the new Viceroy of India. This toast having been drunk with no less cordial cheers, the Governor-General replied. He alluded "with pride and sorrow" to the example of those who fell in the terrible struggle of 1857; and, with regard to the Punjaub especially, declared that he had seen with the greatest pleasure how much its condition had improved under the rule of his successor at Lahore.

PARIS FASHIONS FOR JANUARY.

For the soirées and fêtes of the winter season just inaugurated, the modes are remarkable for the luxury and complication of the ornaments and arrangements of dresses and coiffures; moreover, if all that rumour predicts should prove to be true, the year of grace 1865 will compete with its predecessor in the extravagance of its fashions, and especially in the profusion of articles which might be dispensed with, and which have but little merit in their employment other than that of "doing good for trade," which thrives gloriously in these times of showy Parisian display. Brocaded silk, satin, and velvet dresses abound; but plush velvets are preferred to the ordinary plain velvets or cloths, the last being almost entirely confined to morning dress, or the incognito, as it is now prettily called in Paris. As for bonnets, they are reduced almost to simple fanchons, and leave but little space for the exercise of the decorative imagination of the modistes, who, however, by the introduction of peacocks' and other feathers, rich flowers, and lace, still contrive to render their productions as costly as before.

Short paletots and short redingotes, with or without hoods, are the parduses de prédilection; but the hood, or capuchin, will be a special characteristic of the '65 winter season, and is very gracefully shaped and ornamented with ruching in silk or in swandown.

In the way of furs, Astrakan, particularly for trimming, is much patronised, and deservedly so, for it is always elegant in appearance, and admits of very general application to different parts of a lady's toilet.

Long waistbands of lace are generally en vogue for the present season; they are mostly black, but white ones are also worn. For the toilet of a bride the white lace waistband over a satin robe is extremely elegant and tasteful.

THE ILLUSTRATIONS.

Fig. 1. Evening Dress.—Robe of pale rose-coloured taffety, the corsage à coeur ornamented with a sort of basquine composed of black velvet bands trimmed with lace. The sleeves are provided with a narrow trimming to match, designed as shown in our Illustration.

Fig. 2. Visiting Dress.—Fawn-coloured robe of poplin or taffety, with trimmings either in moire antique or velvet, several shades darker than that of the dress. Sometimes a plain light-coloured silk is chosen for this style of robe, and then the trimmings just mentioned are advantageously replaced by black satin ornaments. Velvet waistband, fastened with buckle in mother-of-pearl. Light-brown velvet bonnet, trimmed with a white lace fanchon and a twisted feather.

Fig. 3. Walking Dress.—Plain but ample black silk dress. The principal feature of this toilet is the blue velvet pale-cloth mantle, which is thickly trimmed with brandebourgs attached by large mother-of-pearl buttons.

The Coiffure.—The head-dress depicted in the background of our Engraving is the most novel as to arrangement, and has been frequently executed with success by one of the principal hairdressers in Paris: the ornamentation consists of black velvet and an abundance of imitation coral beads.

MR. J. C. HORSLEY, R.A.

THE election of two new members of the Royal Academy, Mr. J. C. Horsley and Mr. Thomas Faed, was announced last week. A portrait of Mr. Faed appeared in our Journal at the time of his election as an Associate. Mr. John Callcott Horsley, whose portrait (from a photograph by Messrs. J. and C. Watkins) we have here engraved, has been long very favourably known to the public as a charming genial painter of incident. The subjects of his pictures in this class have ranged from "grave to gay, from lively to severe"—now full of humour, graceful or racy, and never unrefined; then, again, rich with delicate sentiment which is always clear of mere vulgar or unsullin sentimentality. The scenes of these subjects have been equally various; often they have been familiar and contemporary, but more frequently, perhaps, they have been laid in the Old England of our pleasantest fancy. Probably few, if any, living painters have given to all unsophisticated lovers of art more unalloyed pleasure by works of similar character. But Mr. Horsley is less widely known for powers he has occasionally displayed in that difficult branch of art, monumental painting. Yet in the latter capacity, as in the former, the artist has for many years deserved the suffrages of the Academy; and his claims for both united have, it seems to us, been tardily recognised.

John Callcott Horsley, the grand-nephew of Sir Augustus Callcott, R.A., was born in London, Jan. 10, 1817. He studied in the schools of the Royal Academy. His first picture, exhibited at the British Institution, and painted, we believe, before the artist was twenty, brought him at once into notice, and is mentioned in one of Wilkie's letters. The subject of the picture, "Rent Day at Hadden Hall in the Sixteenth Century," indicated the main direction of the painter's subsequent practice. The scenes of two other important pictures have been placed in the same mansion. In fact, although Haddon has been painted in a thousand different ways, Mr. Horsley is, we believe, the only painter who has taken important portions of that most interesting building literally as backgrounds for elaborate subject pictures. In the "Rent Day" it was the banqueting hall; in the "Duenna's Return" (exhibited at the International) it was another portion; and in the "Checkmate Next Move" it was the apartment that had been the drawing-room of the Vernons, and afterwards the Manners of the Manners. This last picture, which we engraved on its exhibition at the Royal Academy in 1862, is to our mind Mr. Horsley's masterpiece in oil. We do not remember to have seen a more admirably-painted interior, or effects of sunlight represented with more exquisite truthfulness. Mr. Horsley first exhibited at the Royal Academy the touching picture, "The Pride of the Village," purchased by Mr. Vernon, and now at South Kensington. To name merely a few more of the artist's principal works will sufficiently bear out our observations respecting the kind of subject for which he has shown a preference:—"The Contrast—Youth and Age" (1840); "Leaving the Ball" another "Contrast"—gay pleasure-seekers on the one hand, and the homeless outcast on the other; "Winning Gloves" (1842); "The Father's Grave" (1843); "Hospitality" (1850); "Youth and Age" (1851); "The Madrigal—'Keep Your Time'" (1852); "Showing a Preference" (1860), "The New Dress," and "The Bashful Swain" of the last Exhibition in Trafalgar-square. As an illustrator of eminent authors, Mr. Horsley showed the same excellent qualities in "Malvolio i' the Sun" (1849), "Scene from 'Don Quixote,'" and "L'Allegro and Il Penseroso," painted for the late Prince Consort, an engraving of which appeared in the Art-Journal for August, 1858; and in several graceful and pleasing drawings for the wood-engraver. In another walk, that which may be called "historical genre," Mr. Horsley is represented in "Lady Jane Grey and Roger Ascham," exhibited in '53, the year in which the painter was elected an A.R.A., and "Milton Dictating 'Samson Agonistes'" (1856). In '57 the artist exhibited a portrait of Brunel, the great engineer.

In the grand movement for the development of mural painting in this country by the decoration of the new Houses of Parliament, Mr. Horsley has taken, as we have already intimated, a prominent and successful part. In the (first) cartoon competition of 1843, at Westminster Hall, he obtained one of the three second-class prizes of £200 for his "Saint Augustine Preaching." In the trial of skill in the same place, on the following year, his two small frescoes obtained him a place among the six painters commissioned to execute further samples. In 1845 his design, "The Spirit of Religion," was approved of, and the subject subsequently executed over the Strangers' Gallery in the House of Lords. This fresco has much of that largeness of style indispensable in painted monumental decorations, but which few artists whose practice has been confined to the painting easel pictures succeed in attaining. He received a commission also to execute "Satan Surprised at the Ear of Eve," now in the Poets'-hall of the Westminster Palace. In 1847 his colossal oil-painting, "Henry V., Believing the King Dead, Assumes the Crown," secured for him a premium of the third class.

Mr. Horsley has besides identified himself with the efforts for improving the national taste in ornamental art, and was for some time one of the Head Masters of the School of Design at Somerset House. We think it will be felt, even from this slight sketch, that few artists can point to more various and honourable work during their career; and that it is a cause of congratulation, both to the artist and the public, that he has at last received the higher honour the Academy has to confer.

With regard to Mr. Faed, he is probably, after Mr. Frith, the most popular of our painters of "figure-subject pictures." Few pictures exhibited at the Academy have pleased a larger number of visitors, and few have been "the talk of the town" more generally than "The Mitherless Bairn" and "From Dawn to Sunset;" while few of the painters who have arrived at the honour of having their works engraved attract a larger crowd round printshop windows. The pleasing or pathetic themes he has usually chosen may have contributed one element towards his success; but we may depend upon it that it is not for this quality alone that he has been elected by a jealous body of his professional brethren, now more than ever amenable to public opinion, an R.A. at the comparatively early age of thirty-eight. Mr. Faed is a genre painter, in direct descent from the Dutch masters through Wilkie. The general characteristics of his art are too well known to require particular comment. His subjects and treatment have been similar in kind throughout. Only, he has, from higher apparent finish in his early works, rapidly advanced in freedom, breadth, and masterly execution in those of a later date. It was in 1851 that "Mitherless Bairn" appeared on the walls of the Academy; and although it was characterised in Mr. Ruskin's Art Notes of that year as "throughout the most commonplace Wilkieism—white spots everywhere"—it must be Mr. Faed's reputation that has been followed by works which, we may almost say, to name is to praise—as "The Breach in the Family" (1857), "A Lesson in Humanity: Aunt Gude o' Hunsel" (1858), "Sunday in the Backwoods" (1859), "His Only Pair" (1860), "From Dawn to Sunset"—a family of three generations, from the grand-parent to the child, all in their manifold and most truly pathetic picture Mr. Faed has painted; "New Wars to an Old Sodger" (1863), "Tenant Pat or a Child" (1863), and "Bailie Pathie and Mither," in the last Exhibition.

THE GUARD-HOUSE OF HUMAITA, PARAGUAY.

Among the latest news from South America, we heard of the opening of the electric telegraph to the city of Asuncion, the capital of Paraguay. A railway, under English management, has for some time been at work in that isolated State, which has, till lately, been distinguished by a curious mixture of barbarism and civilisation in the social condition, as in its political constitution it is unlimited in republic, but in effect one of the strictest despotisms upon earth. The people are little better than savages, and immense tracts of fertile land are still a wilderness; but there are signs of improvement. We are indebted to Mr. David Powell, who lately travelled in that region, for the sketch we have engraved, giving a view of Humaita, the great military station of Paraguay, which is reached soon after entering the Rio Paraguay from the Plate, at the south-western corner of the river, the batteries extending for about half a mile. The guns are on earthworks, under thatched sheds, but it is rather doubtful whether they are all mounted, and no vessel has ever passed the Brazilian fleet in the river. Humaita is a large town, with a population varies from 12,000 to 20,000 men: they are dressed in red Garibaldi shirts, white trousers, and blue pouches. The service is compulsory, and 1,000 men only is given. The sentries are relieved by a boy, with a pigeon-house high above all the buildings—one of which is shown in the foreground.

MUSIC.

The Christmas performance of "The Messiah," given by the National Choral Society at Exeter Hall on Wednesday, the 21st inst., was on so great a scale and so excellent in all respects, that it did the highest honour to the society and the able conductor, Mr. G. W. Martin. The principal solo-singers were Madame Lemmens Sherrington, Mr. Wilbye Cooper, and Mr. Weiss; the band and chorus numbered above seven hundred performers; and the orchestra, chorus, and solo work were given, not only with vast grandeur, but with a degree of precision and clearness worthy of unqualified praise. In the Sinfonia Pifa, the performance on an extensive organ will be a great gain to the public, for even her greatest admirers were not prepared for the display of power and skill in the instrumental branch of her art. The hall was crowded to the door. The National Choral Society seems to have now conquered all the difficulties attending its position on entering the new building, thanks to Mr. Martin's energetic management, is entitled to be ranked among the most important musical institutions of the metropolis.

The Monday Popular Concerts at St. James's Hall are to begin for the season on Monday next. The simple announcement of this fact is itself to be welcomed by numerous lovers of music readers; for these concerts—already renowned throughout Europe—do not require a word of information respecting the kind of music—and, we are assured, with the same spirit as heretofore, and doubtless with the same success. Joachim, the prince of violinists, will appear early in the season; and we trust that Arabella Goddard, the queen of pianists—who is now making a tour which may be called a triumphal progress through the provinces—will be among the artists to adorn with her presence concerts which, in a great measure, owe to her their fame and prosperity.

Mr. Alexander Thayer, the distinguished American musical litterateur, has been appointed United States Consul at Trieste. Mr. Thayer's long-expected "Life of Beethoven," in which he has been occupied for many years, will soon, we hope, be given to the world.

Mr. Aguilar's ante-Christmas series of pianoforte matinées was terminated on the 21st inst. The entertainments consisted of pieces of the highest order, including Mozart's fine sonata in F, and a solo consisting of Bach's fantasia in C minor, Mendelssohn's "Rondo Capriccioso," and Bach's prelude and fugue in G—all by Mr. Aguilar's pupil, Miss Weldon, whose performances did honour both to her teacher and herself. The other pieces in the programme—among which were Beethoven's sonata in A flat (which contains the celebrated Funeral March); two of Mendelssohn's "Lieder ohne worte," Aguilar's fantasia on "Faust," his transcription of Weber's big bolero, and other recent compositions—were performed by Mr. Aguilar. The selection was, throughout, of the highest character of its series, and attracted a crowded and highly fashionable audience, by whom the principal pieces were warmly applauded. Mr. Aguilar's refined and instructive matinées will be resumed, we believe, after the holidays.

The committee of management of the Stoke Newington Ladies' College gave a soirée musicale on Monday, the 19th inst., at the rooms of the institution, in Paradise-row, under the direction of Mr. Hoppé, Mus. Doc. The flourishing educational establishment is carried on with judgment and spirit, the teachers employed are of known ability and experience, and the pupils appeared to study assiduously useful. On this occasion an elegant selection of vocal and instrumental music was performed. The programme included other classical pieces, besides Haydn's glee, "The hunt is up;" Culloch's glee, "With sighs, sweet rose;" Hatton's part-song, "When evening's twilight;" and Bishop's glee "Blest be the tie"—all sung by Messrs. Ball, Taylor, Harries, and Henry. The favourite air, "Gentle flower," from Haydn's new opera, "Love in Constantinople," Glück's gentle and fine romance, "Che faro senza Euridice;" and Brinley Richards' song, "The rose," sung by Mrs. Roncy (late Miss Helen Hogarth); Mayer's pianoforte solo "La Cascade;" Harold Thomas's new fantasia on themes from Flotow's "Stradella;" his favourite hunting-song, "Gaily the troubadour" (of which a new edition has been published); and Kulak's solo, "Perles d'Ecosse"—all played by Mr. Harold Thomas; and Heller's "Recueil de Perles," played by Miss Tiffin. All these performances were warmly applauded by a crowded and fashionable company.

The Musical Chamber Concert at the Manor House, Hackney, took place on Tuesday, the 20th inst. We have already noticed the excellence of these performances, and on the present festival we shall mention that this concert was even superior to either of the preceding. The programme was wholly composed of music of the highest order, and enjoyed by the admission of a first-class production. It included Beethoven's quartet in A, Spohr's quartet in G minor, and Schubert's quintet in A, all beautiful work, now performed for the first time in England. The performers in these pieces were Mr. Burnett and Mr. Benjamin, violins; Mr. Amor, viola; Mr. H. Howell, violoncello; and Mr. A. Howell, contrabasso. Mozart's trio in E, moreover, for the piano, violin, and violoncello, was played by Messrs. Prout, Burnett, and E. Howell: and Mr. Burnett played the andante and allegro of De Beriot's seventh concerto. The vocal portion of the concert included Schubert's song, "On every tree;" and Kücken's "Oh, what is love?" both sung by Madame Schoegrans; and Clapisson's "Mon âme à Dieu," sung by Mr. A. Howell. The various performances were warmly and deservedly applauded.

The performances of Gounod's "Mireille" have been resumed at the Théâtre Lyrique. The opera has been curtailed and altered in various respects, and the public opinion seems to be that the changes are improvements. We presume that they will be adopted in London.

At the Popular Concert of Classical Music, on Sunday week, in the Champs Elysées, under the direction of M. Pasdeloup, Vincent Wallace's overture to "Lurline" was performed with brilliant success. An opera by Mr. Wallace is to be produced at the Théâtre Lyrique.

Mdlle. Artôt has been singing at Vienna with great success in a German version of Gounod's "Faust." The fair performer receives a thousand francs (£40) for each representation.

Mr. Sawley made his début at Barcelona on the 15th inst. He appeared as the Count di Luna in the "Trovatore," and was received with the utmost enthusiasm.

THE THEATRES.

PANTOMIMES AND EXTRAVAGANZAS.

Those persons, if there be any such, who may feel or fancy objections to the frivolous nature of our Christian entertainments will do well to remind themselves that the vast majority of mankind are children in regard to the "silly-sooth" play of the mechanics in "Midsummer Night's Dream." What says that Shakspearean mentor to the fair Hermia? "Ay me! for aught that I could ever read, Could ever hear by tale or history, The course of true love never did run smooth." And the worst are no worse, if imagination smend them." In more instances than these pantomimes and burlesques are real classics. The subjects of both are previously given in nursery tales and traditions, and those of the latter are known to have been dramatised in some artistic form. In both, the fantastic and the sublime are made ridiculous, and doggerel is preferred to any more serious mode of versification. Nevertheless, the discovery and research, in connection with high claims. "Goethe's "Faust" was seriously written in doggerel for well as a "silly-sooth" play, and is both grave and humorous, profound invention, poetry, and the utmost range of philosophical lore and scientific doctrine; satirising, like scholars, not only the manners of society but the inventions of schools. Even the most ridiculous pantomimes and burlesques have aimed at comprehending the largest variety of topics, and the latest events of interest to the public mind. Their indefatigable spirit has not penetrated. It should also be conducted like the Shakspearean extravaganzas, and Goethe's Faust, not only those of small size, but those of a larger growth. There are those of both kinds; and among the latter not only individuals who have attained to the highest reputation, but whole companies, from some happy fatality, have been all along preserved in a state of childish simplicity. Such, we believe, is the array of labourers who are annually employed in this special service; and the great good which their preparation and enactment do to a large multitude of families, who are maintained by the exercise of the impulses of the mind. The Christmas drama is now an institution which secures fortunes to projectors and ruins to those who employ them. In these days of commercial panic, a consideration will have great weight, and it is alone of sufficient importance to relieve its production of the charge of frivolity in any degree.

It is a time-honoured custom to begin all criticism on the occurrences of the theatres with Drury Lane.

DRURY LANE.—For many years this theatre has subsisted on the production of pantomimes and burlesques, and has had the great merit to ensure the management from loss in regard to the speculation. The Christmas six weeks provide for the entire year. Much of this success is due to Mr. E. T. Smith, who has made elegant pantomimes have been models of composition, judiciously written in the style of Byron and Planché. These light productions are carefully manipulated, and the wit and humour which they convey are equally suited to the ear of the refined adult as to the capacity of children. The mounted utility of the scenery has introduced an uniformly admirable, and the whole is conducted with such judgment and tact that the audience are left to find out for themselves the secret of the fun, and to find out for themselves the secret of the fun, and to stating a mathematical demonstration. His argument for the present year is based upon the well-known introduction of Harlequin by a fairy. English demon or fairy, but infant readers are well prepared for the change by the publication of northern legends which have recently appeared under the auspices of Mr. Dickens. The pantomime for the present year is "Hop-o'-my-Thumb and his Eleven Brothers: or, the Pumpkin and the Fairy of the Seven Lights." The author, Mr. Blanchard has aimed not only at amusement but instruction; and, notwithstanding the number of grotesque and ridiculous scenes, there were some sententious lines which compelled the most laughter-loving to look grave for a moment in order to comprehend. These lights of the dialogue are as delightful as they are artistic. Frequently it is scientific, and sometimes moral, with a dash of satire. In the first instance, the legend of the woodcutter and his twelve children is well applied to stage purposes. But Mr. Blanchard has not trusted to one fable, but he has added that of the Ogre and his Seven Daughters. In the first scene he introduces to us a Lapland witch, relepel Okriki, who, with two cooperators, is engaged in the cave of the ogre of the same ogre. From the witch we proceed to the Man in the Moon, gracefully presented by Miss Rose Leclercq; and a fine scene of moonlight on the Rhine, between the ogre's castle and the Valley of Hosses and Lichens by Daybreak, in which Miss Lydia Thompson appeared as Gretchen Hautboy, and as only she can. The ogre's castle contains in her cheerful display. She was assisted by numerous ogresses, Miss Fanny Leslie, Miss Constance Loseby, Miss Bessie Wall, &c. appeared in the next scene with his eleven brothers in his father's cottage. We spoke so warmly of this diminutive actor last year that we have nothing to add to the praise we then gave, except to insist upon him. None can be properly considered exaggerative. Mr. Beverley's Hop-o'-my-Thumb is, indeed, "a pumpkin" in the one who, fortunately, has not yet "perished in his pride." We rather think that an augmentation of his part would be desirable. We now behold the children in the cave-forest, and are witnesses of the cleverness of Hop-o'-my-Thumb and the terrors of Fee-Fo-Fum, the monstrous ogre of Constance Loseby. The whole of this extravaganza comedy is excruciatingly cruel. And here it is that occurs the dance of Toole is also introduced, and the pantomime becomes more amusement, full of beauty and cleverness. The transformation scene is in Mr. Beverley's best manner, and can only be fairly described in the words of Hop-o'-my-Thumb, "Look, look, look!" and be satisfied with the Fairy Motes that People the Sunbeams." It must be seen; it cannot be imagined from description. We gained a hint, however, that more can we say of the harlequinade, which is doubly supplied with characters, than that Harry Boleno and the Misses Gaunaine the Misses Lupino, the Misses Bennett, the many Misses Payne, the whole has been superintended by Mr. Robert Roxby. The pantomime, we are sure, will be a great success.

COVENT GARDEN.—"Cinderella; or, The Magic Slipper," is the argument that, as it has several times been before, furnished pantomimes for Christmas. The Brothers Grim have not only travestied the old original story, but added to it. We have, therefore, a huge Bobgoblin (Mr. Langham), with a mountain hermitage for his domicile, and a fairy Papilion (Miss Craven), who wager on the susceptibility of the human heart. Against this Bobgoblin the Prince Charming (Miss Rosina Wright) is pitted. Cinderella returns from the ball, and Hobgoblin and Papilion strive for the possession of the heroine. The transformation scene is a wonder, of which it is difficult to render a description. The Fairy's Chrysometer is a monstrous timepiece, the figures on whose face transform themselves into fairy forms, while the clock itself changes to a fairy scene of surpassing beauty. Messrs. Fred and Harry Payne are Harlequin and Clown, Paul Herring is Pantaloon, and Mdlle. Esther, Columbine. But we must not omit Donato, the one-legged dancer, who conceals his deficiency with exquisite grace, dexterity, and spirit. The harlequinade is made the vehicle for many temporary allusions, such as the Anthropophagous, the Davenport Brothers, and the political relations of Denmark and Germany. The appointments are, in all respects, lavish, and nothing has been spared that capital could command; so that, in getting-up, this pantomime is extremely gorgeous.

HER MAJESTY'S.—It serves to show the prevalence of the pantomimic spirit that this theatre should have been subject to its invasion. But so it is; and Mr. H. J. Byron is engaged for the occasion, and makes a story of the nursery rhymes about "The Lion and the Unicorn who were fighting for the Crown," and makes a pantomime of the story. He has created a demon for the occasion, called Sulka, with his attendant imps, Grumble, Grunts, Cantankera, and Morose, who suffer from his oppression and blows. But the unicorn, there is a beneficent fairy, named Miss Button, or Good Temper—the words are synonymous—who comes on behalf of Bobbin, a huntsman (Miss Furtado). There is also a tyrant in "Eccle's vein"—to wit, King Rourkmaulia the Ravagerious (Mr. Rouse), and a military review of his guards. A Princess next turns up, named Peppermintdrop, with whom Robin ultimately elopes. This pantomime is remarkable for a mischievous and apparently wanton application, "Robin Redsis," in which the boundaries of visibility and invisibility are startlingly confused, the figures now appearing and now fading into thin substance—beneath. The stage is exactly the place for these same scientific marvels, and the experiment is a good one. Is the third time of wonders," The fight of the Lion and the Unicorn and the two athletes broken ought to be rewarded with any amount of bread, white or brown. The transformation scene is introduced by a shower of golden rain, which, dissolving, discloses the Paradise of Fairies and the Home of the Silver Zephyrs, in the burnished sun have the cone-legged Clown, Capello, who is clever. The mechanical scene of Eolos Asides is due to Mr. Maurice, of Langham-place, and will contribute greatly to the success of the pantomime.

HAYMARKET.—A neat extravaganza, by Mr. Byron, does duty for pantomime at the Haymarket. It is called "Princess Springtime," and is founded on the only story left undramatised of the Countess D'Aulnoy (La Princesse Printanier). Its heroine, the daughter of King Kokolorum (Mr. Compton) is the object of interest, from her birth to the fairies, who endow her with every grace and virtue. But all fairies are not benevolent when invited, and Caudata is one of all who has been injured, and deems the child to had luck for twenty years. Her parents seek to avert the doom by securing her in a tower until the fatal period has expired. These, for the first time, the Princess sees the light of day, and finds herself in the well known Provençal Fandarinet, the envoy from Prince Brown (Miss Louise Keeley), who suddenly falls in love with her. At this crisis of the story a ballet, arranged by Mr. Conway, is given relief to the main interest, but, on the special scorn of its own merits, obtains a rapturous encore. Day, it does even more than this, for it affords opportunity for the elopement of the loving pair, who are next found on the beautiful island where rose-tide, oaks sing, and nightingales give advice through Caudata, who seeks to separate them. She is not, however, but the temptation fails, and he lives to declare that he is his "own great deputy," for he is himself. The King, for the fairies, returns in time to hear the declaration, though nearly wrecked by a tempest in reaching the shore. The dialogue is throughout very pretty, and the pun of the dialogue are sufficiently abundant. The accessories are liberal, and the whole has been placed on the stage in an effective manner. It is excellently acted.

LYCEUM.—Mr. Fechter, though abiding by his design to depend mainly on the attraction of Hamlet, which he has so far modified in programme as to add a kind of farcical burlesque to the usual entertainments. The extravaganza is of an Oriental character, but bears the thorough English title of "Bear-faced Impostors," and the subject has already been familiarised to our stage under that of "Bears, not Beasts." It consists of a representation of the gardens of a seraglio. The story is slight. The white bear belonging to the Pacha Schahlahnam has run off with the keeper's wife, who is left inconsolable. The members of the Court anticipate the worst result from the passion of the Pacha; but they have provided themselves with two scapegoats in the shape of a very fine English Newfoundland—Bill Stumps and Jack Hocus, whose joint property consists of one beautiful dog, in colour, texture, and size white. The Stumps is clothed, and in this disguise performs a number of tricks before the Pacha, and discovers, to the unbounded joy of the Court, the tearing of Hocus. The sport arises from the rivalry of the supposed bears, and the ignorance of each of the fact that his antagonist is not an animal. The mistake, however of misplacing the heads leads to an explanation, and exposes all parties to the wrath of the deceived Pacha. Without, however, the fun is unlimited, and the pieces, though so slight in subject and structure, is well written, and the dialogue is decidedly witty. The costumes are magnificent. The house was well filled, and the new drama may be pronounced decidedly successful.

PRINCESS'S.—The extravaganza here, written by Messrs. Best and Bellingham, is taken from Auber's opera "Le Cheval de Bronze." It is, accordingly, entitled "The Bronze Horse and the Enchanted Princess." The written can scarcely be complimented on the elegance of their composition, but they have the merit of being simple, and that in their rough way they have put together an available outline, which the scenepainter and the actor have had to fill up. These latter have done justice to the opportunity. The scene is laid in Lowland, where Stella, the ice-maiden, in the power of a magician, exerts an influence over the Bronze Horse, which lends them to their use. Prince Plock-i (Miss Minnie Davis) has dreamed of the maiden, and travels to seek her love. He might fatally have suffered for his infatuation but that he meets Ariel, who is already one of the suite of Cloudland's victims, and who, warning him of his danger, counsels him to find the magic ring which controls the enchantress; and, to roar to Cloudland, there to undo the spell which binds himself to servitude. In the course of the proceeds on the home of Stella, and, alas! the fascinations of Stella are too much for him, and he, like his predecessors, is converted into a statue, and sinks to the Arctic Seas. Ariel, a comedy maiden, who, however, has the quiet witness the influence, and breaks the spell by destroying the Magic Lamp and seizing the Enchanted Ring. The scene then changes to Cloudland—a superb scene, which does great credit to Mr. F. Lloyd's invention and executive power. The splendid and most artistic composition the drama will be indebted for its success.

OLYMPIC.—The extravaganza here is secondary to the stock piece of the theatre, which, therefore, has not therefore been placed in his work, which he has entitled "Cupid and Psyche," and founded on Mrs. Tighe's elegant poem, or Apuleius's tale. We need not describe the latter, as Mrs. Tighe's poem is accessible; how far it is helped out by the puns and parodies which the burlesque writer is expected to supply can only be ascertained by an actual visit to the performance. In one respect, the dramatist has judiciously altered the story of Psyche and the Soul by Love, motivalising the forfeiture which the former had incurred. The managements have provided some exquisite scenery for the illustration of the subject, and the costumes and appointments are rich, costly, and beautiful.

ST. JAMES'S.—The public have to be congratulated on the fact that Miss Reuben has resumed the management of this theatre, which might have been expected, she has provided herself with a part to play. The piece has been written by Mr. William Brough, and entitled "Hercules and Omphale." The burlesque is admirably made up by Miss Charlotte Saunders, and the nymph herself is beautifully impersonated by Miss Reuben. The piece has all the vivacity in the world which commends it to critical appreciation. The scenery, by Mr. Telbin, is grand and beautiful; and in all respects, indeed, the performance is excellent.

STRAND.—We think highly of Mr. Reynolds' new extravaganza on Mr. Buckstone's old subject. Much has been converted into "Ern Bushes." It is not without difficulty that the pathetic story of the original drama lends itself to the purposes of burlesque, but it appears to us that Mr. Byron has successfully surmounted all the dangers of his attempt. The manner in which it has been placed on the boards, his attempt. The manner in which it has been placed on the boards, and in which it is acted by the various performers, is admirable. It has also made us acquainted with the merits of Mr. James Steph, who acts Mami, as a burlesque actor, with great force, and stage with a power which surprised the house. We may compliment safely Miss Ada Swanborough, as Geraldine, who had to maintain the interest of the character and yet to make it funny. Phil Murtogh loses none of his importance in the hands of Miss Maria Simpson, and Miss Raynham, as O'Kennedy, looked and acted superbly. Mr. Byron may be congratulated on having achieved a decided success in this burlesque.

SADLER'S WELLS.—Mr. Edgar has wisely enlisted in his cause the local associations of Islington. His pantomime, written by Mr. Millward, is entitled "Sir Hugh Middleton; or, the Fairy of the Crystal Stream." The opening, which is judiciously embellished with songs, introduces scenery connected with the olden time, and presents the old Sadler's Wells and St. John's Gateway, now rendered so celebrated as the haunt of the Urban Club, whose fidelity to Shakspeare is not exhumed by public indifference. The ballet and the scene of the Lord Mayor of the Maiden of the Stream are both excellent. The transformation scene, which is by Mr. Broadfoot, is a brilliant affair, and the harlequinade is well supplied. Mr. Buck, as Clown; Mr. J. Cavera, as Harlequin; and Mr. W. Lacy, as Pantaloon, are all highly efficient performers. Miss A. Batty, as Columbine, is exceedingly graceful. There is no doubt that the manager's efforts to please the Clerkenwell public will be crowned with success.

SURREY.—Mr. Shepherd's skill in getting up a pantomime has won for this theatre a reputation for ease of management which does not easily lose. This year, perhaps, the manager has outdone all his former doings. The title of the new production is "Harlequin King Pumpkin; or, Richard le Lion Coeur." The author wishes to history, perhaps improves it, by attributing to the chivalrous monarch a motive in the tender passion in aid of the patriotism by which we all know he was distinguished. The daughter of King Marrowphat, monarch of the Pumpkin Islands, is like Lady Isabella—Her name is Beauty, and is appropriate to her person; but she, with her brother and father, is imprisoned in Palestine by that Sultan and sorcerer, Saladin. But Richard, with his faithful Blondel, arrives in the Pumpkin Islands with a view to her rescue; but the former, by magic art, is transformed into a tame lion, and Saladin himself takes the form of Harlequin. This "fiery steed" is in this instance a donkey. The poor animal returns with its brother, and so frightens Saladin himself that the latter's apparition that the monarch becomes fugitive and oblivious of his magic sword and shield, which fall into the possession of Blondel, who, by their aid, releases both King Richard and Princess Beauty. This is a neat story intelligibly told, which is a great because a rare merit in a pantomime. The whole of the scenery is admirably executed. The transformation, the work of Mr. Calicott, deservedly aroused the enthusiasm of the house.

ASTLEY'S.—Under the title of "Harlequin Jack Sprat, or the Three Blind Mice; and Great A, Little A, and Bouncing B, the Cat's in the Cupboard, and she can't See," Mr. Conquest has produced a very amusing pantomime, in which Tom Tiddler, Mother Shipton, and the Jolly Miller and his Daughter play parts suited to their respective powers, and well calculated to provoke the laughter of holiday folk. The transformation scene is splendid and elaborate, and, though not quite in working time on Boxing Night, commanded much professional applause. Other particulars await also future manipulation; but when all is got into right trim, no doubt the piece will prove a great attraction.

STANDARD.—There were three performances of the pantomime at this house on Monday—two in the morning and one in the evening. It is entitled "Jane Dundas and the Seven Champions of Christendom; or, Harlequin Robert and Richard were Two Pretty Men." Dame Dundas and Fairy Prettyface are good. The latter is represented by one of the sons, Willy, to the exclusion of the other two, Robert and Richard, for he is dumb-crambo, and not Harlequin. The tale and wood, the transformation scene, with its live stock, makes an amusing scene. The Princess Blossom, who is the subject of a Royal proclamation, is ultimately destined for Willy. The opening is remarkable for the number of its allusions, many of which are political, and all told well on the audience. The transformation scene is remarkable, and implies an amount of mechanical power which is enormous. The subject, too, is remarkably ambitious—the Palace of Revelving Pyramatic Worlds, and Temple of Animation." Altogether, this Standard pantomime is a great success.

CITY ELDORADO.—Mr. Rouse has always caters well for himself. His pantomime is called "The King of the Golden Valley; or, Harlequin Tiddler, Fairy Boy Blue, and the Queen Who Lived under the Hill." So well had this pantomime been rehearsed that it went with remarkable smoothness. We must leave, however, the voluminous title of the pantomime to speak for itself; it would be impossible to comprise the multifarious details of the plot within moderate limits, but the reader will see that the manager has left it to justice to the author's ingenuity and well-practised skill. The stage arrangements are admirable, and the scenery, particularly the transformation scene, excited enthusiastic admiration.

THE GRECIAN.—The pantomime here is on the highly popular subject of "Punch and Judy." Mr. Green's show, on a small scale, was built up on the stage, and within its picture-frame Mr. George Conquest represented some of the doings of Punch and his wife as always so delighted a street audience. The structure of the work is very elaborate, and the scenery distinguished by its great beauty and completeness. The transformation scene, which is a most delightful grand, picturesque, complex, and beautiful, reflects great credit on the artist. Mr. Messenger, who has displayed taste into arrangement, is supported by this his first production.

PAVILION.—An effective pantomime, entitled "St. George and the Dragon; or, the Seven Champions of Christendom," was produced successfully on Christmas Eve. The subject sufficiently indicates the plot. It is well illustrated by some remarkably good scenery and some brilliant costumes; and was throughout adequately acted.

LEIPSIC UNIVERSITY.

The Leipsic University in the present term contains 893 students, of whom 644 are natives of Saxony, and 318 foreigners.

A telegram from Suez states that the packet-ship Hydaspes has been wrecked in the Strait of Bab-el-Mandeb, and large seas were running.

At a concert which took place recently at the Royal Opera House at Berlin, Ole Bull, the celebrated Norwegian violin-player, reappeared, after an interval of many years, on the stage, and produced his magic influence over his instrument which he displayed in years long passed away.

A certain Mr. Cunningham has brought an old Scotch almanack book shop at Leyden, and places among the archives of that city. The volume, written on parchment, gives the amount of the revenue and expenses of the royal court of the Lowlands and of the city of Leyne, for three years at the end of the tenth century, which is considered connected with the history of the Scottish kings.

HISTORY OF A DIAMOND.—The Imperial Court at Paris has been at one time a settlement of the Colonist of the nation in question brought in June, 1853, for the recovery of a diamond to the 400,000l. A man, named Lejeune, who had been in France for India, where he ultimately became the generalissimo of the armies of the Mahratta empire. For eighteen years he was the trusted friend and adviser of the Prince, and exercised a kind of superstitious influence, attributed by the magicians of the country to a ruby or hard which he wore on his finger. On his left hand, mutilated by a grape shot. Notwithstanding his brilliant position, Lejeune could not keep himself out of debt, and was imprisoned in 1806. From that moment fortune seemed to desert him, for he had a narrow escape from losing his life by shipwreck on the coast of Spain, arrived in France, he found that 8,000,000f., which he had remitted to that country some time before, had been seized by the Government, and represented but a small fraction of the original sum. With what remained, however, he resolved once more to try his fortune, which he had purchased some ironworks on the frontiers of Spain. Having been taken prisoner by some Spanish guerrillas, and imprisoned in a subterranean dungeon, he managed he at last effected his escape by swimming to a passing vessel, which landed him in Egypt, where he proceeded to Syria. He afterwards married the great Lady Stanhope, and was subsequently joined by his son, a captain of the Imperial Guard, who had been sent by Napoleon on a mission to arrange his political opinions by the Government of the Restoration. His son died in 1826; and Lady Stanhope, likewise, which rendered the return of Lieut.-General Lostumenon, not having any mode of living, was received into a charitable asylum, where he died. The diamond also vanished. When he purchased his ironworks, in 1807, the General went to Paris and acquired M. de Lejeune, the former owner of the diamond, the farcical present of the Prince of the Mahrattas, valued at 400,000l., which the General had intended to offer to their Imperial Majesties. To recover this diamond, Miller, Lostumenon, the General's heiresses, brought the action above mentioned against the heirs of M. Lejeune, but their demand was rejected by the Tribunal. Against that judgment Miller, Lostumenon was appealed, alleging that the diamond had either never been restored or had been given up to a person who had no right to receive it. The heirs of M. Lejeune, however, produced the deposit receipt and proved that the diamond had been restored to the person to whom General Lostumenon had intrusted that document. They caused admit that, even supposing it lost, the demand was barred by prescription, as time decided by the Civil Code. The Imperial Court, taking that view of the case, declared that the judgment must be confirmed, and condemned Millier, Lostumenon to pay all costs.—Gazette.

MEMBERS OUT OF PARLIAMENT.

THE borough of Malden is situated on what in normally flat Essex may be denominated a high hill. If there were times when there was any necessity for raising every now and then the pons asinorum of the district by the old means of a beacon fire, there could be no better venue for the signal-station than the height on which this town stands. Those physical advantages may, by an unconscious parity of reasoning, have induced the politicians of the county to select it as the point whereon they could be metaphorically conspicuous to the constituency. Both parties hold fiery days there from time to time, and the bustle and excitement of those occasions may well be supposed to be intensified by the quiet character of ordinary which are then poured forth may be imagined to rush in terrifying or scattering, as the case may be, down the sides of the hill, permeating the electoral plains for political results. At all times the periodical meetings of Essex politicians at Malden are pregnant with fate to the country; but just as present they have a peculiar significance and a more than ordinary importance. Naturally, the question of Reform may be the statement, it is still necessary to observe that the representation of Essex is not exactly in accordance with it. It contains but one member of the Liberal party, and he one of the members for Malden who, at the general election of 1857, broke through the magnetic chain of Conservatism which surrounded the constituency for the county, and has remained the observed of all observers—the asserted and vaunted anomaly of the Liberal representation of Essex. It is peculiarly, a very tempting cockshy to the Tory party, who recognise in him a tangible leader of their presumptive feature of membership, and who are bitterly aggrieved at this slight advantage gained by the alleged minority of the Essex electors. It has been determined that all means should be taken to remove this anomaly from the representation, and a Tory candidate for Malden has been regularly introduced, and guaranteed all possible support. Naturally, the Liberals have rallied round him, and they are getting up a special tintamarre, and talk big about not only preserving their one pet lamb, but of the feasibility of squeezing a second member out of the constituency. It is to be hoped that the annual demonstration of the Malden Liberal Independent Club took place on Saturday last, and the deputation from it will be a cry to stand up against Tory domination, and it was supposed that it is for Liberal representation to the object for the borough would have been paraded in like manner, as was done on a former occasion at a Conservative gathering in the place. This, however, does not appear to have been the case, but the Liberals have made a demonstration of the status quo will content the aspirations of the Liberals for the present.

To say the truth, there is a remarkable identity—a predominant sameness in the "personages" who attend these meetings year after year. The representatives of the Tory party are the same individuals, and the unchanged speakers are put to their wits to prove themselves various in the matter of their speeches, and to say the same principally called upon to illustrate. No doubt the patriotic is excellent, but it was upon the Liberal party that the invaryingness begets an idea that the local Liberalism which it is sought to preserve is a popular institution, and which is not appreciated so much as its magnitude entitles it to be, that the Liberals of Essex are not sufficiently alive to its importance. It is, therefore, no small matter that of late circumstances have brought about a change, and, unusual as the fact is, there is now in this door between him and the Cabinet, and whose presence at the Malden banquets varies, if it does not much enliven the proceedings, at least stirs them up a little. It is a change which is generally applauded by those who are present. Indeed, looking to the speech which Mr. Chichester Fortescue delivered on the 22nd, it is not to be questioned whether it was likely to have much direct effect on the Liberal constituency of the borough. Possibly it may have a good deal about the last place where an erudite exposition of colonial policy and a broad definition of the abstract politics of the Government would be calculated to be appreciated, rather than the more sympathies which were needed. Mr. Sutton Wetters, who was talking to his constituents on Friday last, was perhaps more to the point to say happy enough in the distribution of smart personal antitheses which illustrated the thing that was to be done and the way of doing it. He made some very effective hits at Tories, and, while giving the getting liberal government out of Tory Ministers, and if here and there getting what was not exactly unmusical, and was at least highly intelligible at the lower tables, yet those parts of his speech were for session at which the Conservatives received the most copious applause. Then came Mr. Buxton, without whom these gatherings would lose a feature; and who was, owing to a recent circumstance, even more conspicuous than he usually appears to be. Every one knows what his definition of Liberalism is, and that, unlike some professors of that name, he really does not believe in anything, but looks like its extension, simply because they do not believe in anything, he, leaving a man free to be practical, and to adjust and substitute our electoral system, rather than to destroy it altogether, without reference to any particular principle except that of expansion. On the occasion of the Malden dinner Mr. Buxton's speech contains avowedly the whole ostensible policy of the Conservative party, as it is their policy to be, and is not to be, according to what it was, after all, an appeal to a county consistency for a party, to show that it threatened the Church in no respect, and that the taking of it stand on that head. Mr. Buxton's speech was a good one, but he has no device of an effete political organisation.

It is certainly not necessary to have identified itself with a cause, and especially a cause which has triumphed. The borough of Reading for Mr. Sergeant Sir Francis Goldsmid, has attained that enviable position. It has been art and part in the Government of de-christianising the Legislature which was to have been attended with those fearful consequences which were to have made the Saxon fame more harmless, unaggressive, and undemonstrative gentleman than Sergeant Goldsmid. Indeed, he is the last man to be more demonstrative, the most ambitious of them is Sir Francis Goldsmid—but his efforts are so mildly spasmodic—he seems to us to be struggling with great force to keep down a spasm—that they are unobjectionable—anxious to do something, but not to have made up his mind exactly in his way of doing it. He is a specimen of the most harmless, but easy-going member who, born in an official atmosphere, has caught the particular tone which characterises the Parliamentary Secretaries and Lords of the Treasury. He demeans himself after the manner of his order—in what may be designated the hands-in-the-pocket style—not exactly lounging, but as though he were in parliament only would listening to, but that anybody who cares may observe that he has managed to get his hands into his pockets, and to be in most tangible shape. Although, to be sure, their line was different from that to which he is predestined. One wonders what Mr. Shaw Lefevre thinks of the abstinent electors of Hertford, and whether he hopes that, some day, his own constituents may imitate, however imperfectly, their reticence of demand on the voice and interest of M.P.s and Government officials. Anyway, judging from what passed at his and his colleague's intercommunication with their clients the other day, there is a mutual satisfaction; and if hereafter Sir Francis Goldsmid gets out his great speech and Mr. Lefevre gets an office adequate to his merits, the constituency will be proportionably glorified.

POST OFFICE STATISTICS.

The Postmaster-General's Tenth Annual Report for 1863 was issued yesterday week. It differs from former reports, inasmuch as it reviews the progress of the department during the past ten years as well as during 1863. The tables show that the correspondence of the kingdom has risen from about 76,000,000 letters in 1839 (the last year preceding the introduction of penny postage) to upwards of 640,000,000 letters in 1863. Several causes have contributed to bring about this increase of correspondence—such as the reduction of postage, the growth of population, the increase of trade, the spread of education, and the general prosperity which the year 1863 shared with regard to the transmission of letters.

The following are the increases in the number of receptacles for letters has been much higher than the rate of increase in the number of post-towns, since the number of letters throughout the kingdom have been increased at the rate of 52 per cent, whilst the inhabited houses have increased only 20 per cent, and the rate only 15 per cent. The increase in the number of letters has been a marked proportion to increase of the facilities for posting them. Each new receptacle is usually in small quantities, and of course it saves labour. The great extension of accommodation has been effected mainly by wall-letter-boxes and wall-receivers, of which 1,000 were put into use in 1863, and now form nearly one third of the whole number of receptacles for letters.

The foreign correspondence coming into the United Kingdom for delivery and about one fifteenth of the whole number of letters delivered. The letters despatched to foreign countries and colonies are nearly equal in number to those which are received. The correspondence increased by half in one of France. In 1854, before the reduction of postage thither, the correspondence amounted only to 2,000,000 letters; in 1863 it was 3,000,000; and in 1864 it had reached 4,370,000.

It is believed that 18 per cent of the total number of letters posted in London contain money orders. The number of money orders issued in the last ten years has increased by 1,307,000 letters, which were obviously circulated without the aid of the department. Compared to various other countries, The number of letters recorded as circulars, however, is much below the actual number posted in London, as they are usually sent in small quantities under covers. Of the number above recorded 1,000,000 were from dropsies; and in 1863, 600,000 circulars with regard to the projected Postal Telegraph Service distributed in one day to the Post Office in two vans, which they filled.

With regard to the Money Order Office and Savings Banks the following remarks are made:—"The money-order office, which was established in the year 1838 for the purpose of facilitating the transmission of small sums by the poor persons, has gradually become the bank of the whole trading community. It affords an absolute security to those who are desirous of remitting or receiving money from one part of the country to another. Money orders are often issued for large amounts. The depositor is so completely safe that more than one in every 100,000 of the orders issued is paid to another than the lawful owner. For orders under 10s. the charge is 2d.; but three postmarks and duplicates are issued on application by the lawful owners. . . . As usual with post-office savings banks, the convenience and facilities for the investment of small sums were given chiefly in wealthy and densely-populated places, in none of which is the average amount of deposit so large as in the depositors to population is highest in such localities. In the London district of Finsbury, which contains 100,000 persons, there are 661 banks and those in post-office banks together for every seven persons; in the big postal districts of England and Wales there is one depositor for every 10 persons; there is one for every thirteen persons; in the rest of England and Wales one for every fifteen persons; in Scotland one for every seventeen persons; and in Ireland one for every sixty-eight persons."

In the annual statement of expenditure the Postmaster-General observes that, "though a largely-increased cost has been incurred by the department in carrying out the improvements described in the report, the total of the same time many additions have been made to the emoluments of post-office servants, the net revenue of the department for the year ending March 31, 1864, including the cost of foreign and colonial mails, has risen from £389,000 per annum in 1854 to £1,042,000 per annum in 1863."

THE PENINSULA OF LENKORAN.

The peninsula of Lenkoran (Asiatic Russia) contains numerous springs of naphtha, which are now worked, which annually absorb about 4000 tons of naphtha, similar to that brought from America. There are also many springs of the kind in the Isle of Taman.

THE FARM.

IF the English butcher has retained the cunning eye and hand of his Parisian rival in making even carcases picturesque, there is a solid national significance in his Christmas "effects." The colours may be "streaky" bacon, but the arrangement is Roman in his arrangement. His upper hooks are devoted to those mutton aristocrats "with right honourable descents;" and the "prime" ticket or ticket of his eternal "shilling parts." The shorthorns have also borne their part well, and Mr. Stratton, the canny "Tom" Stratton, whose many successes by in Knightsbridge, and was, appropriately enough, fed by one of the Highland Dukes, the Duke of Buccleuch, has taken home a prize for a Galloway heifer; and Mr. George Heal, of Rickerby, has sold his shorthorn ox, which, judging from the price (£70), ought to have tried to keep it for himself.

Strange to say, while nearly all our large towns have regular Christmas shows of cattle, there is not one for the encouragement of the private enterprise of Messrs. Swan and Sons, the eminent salesmen, who have twelve classes for cattle and five for sheep, to which prize and sometimes even extra prizes are awarded, besides a silver cup for the best prize animal, and a five-guinea one for the best pen of sheep. Entries are made by the 1st of December, and made of it open to all in each class and one third to the second. It was a very excellent show, and there was a very good attendance of the agricultural and trading many of the London beasts. A red "crossbred" ox, belonging to Messrs. Martin, of Aberdeen, took the cup, after a close contest with a "Devon" and a "shorthorn," and received the cup ox was sold for £54; and Mr. M'Combie made 37s. per cwt. for his Aberdeenshire (crossbred) for his polled ox, and 36s. 6d. for his Aberdeenshire horned. Two other breeders sold on the same system. Mr. Stratton's Tweed fifty-five entries were furnished by some of the first breeders in Scotland. The Duke of Buccleuch's capital lass been made out of the Edinburgh dairy cows, that the managers of the show thought it right to give a special prize for them. A herd from themselves; and although there was only five weeks' notice, twenty-two were sent in. The Duke of Buccleuch realised £25 each, which were thirty-seven pens of sheep, and this year the shearling crossbreds of Mr. Robert Mason, of Morton Mains, near Edinburgh, took the cup, and made £5 10s. each. Mr. Mason also had Cheviot shearlings (£4), the Leicesters, £4 15s., and the black-faced and the Southdown wethers £4 each. Mr. Mason's sheep are well known to the public at Liverpool (where Messrs. Martin's grey ox—half shorthorn and half Highland—was sold for £70), and they were very fine. The feeding up the show is a very common task, and the Messrs. Swan are not without hope that the new Farmers' Club will shortly relieve them.

A good deal of interest has been excited in Edinburgh by the regular system of auctioneering over dead Messrs. Swan's sale of cattle-dealers, which is alleged to have been made by the Glasgow police, at Swan's, the Professor of Agriculture in Glasgow. Glasgow of farmers on the subject was recently held at the Corn Exchange, with Mr. Hope of Fenton Barns in the chair. The cattle, owing, as it was said, to the Edinburgh system, had to be sold by auction, carried out only in Glasgow, but after some of them were sold and taken to Edinburgh. The meeting was addressed by the police authorities were awaiting the special train which brought 140 to Glasgow, and four others extended their existence to the next day, when they stood in the market. Several were sold and sent back to Edinburgh, with their kind friends in attendance as far as the station, and, according to Mr. Swan, the Edinburgh system of markets was approved of by the Professor to get out of bed and take possession of them on their return, but he declined to do so. It was also stated that the Edinburgh system had the result of a massive official inquiry that there was not a diseased beast among them; but there was a heavy loss on them, as butchers did not care to be watched and dogged by the police in their operations. As Mr. Swan truly said, such proceedings, if unchecked, would soon put an end to cattle-dealing altogether. A committee of farmers has been appointed to inquire into the case, and report to the Lord Provost at an early date, when the matter will be remembered, from our very full analysis of the proceedings before the House of Commons' Committee at the time, that Mr. Swan, who came to London solely at his own expense, gave some most important evidence against "Professor Glasgow's bill." That gentleman has made no sign in this case, so far, beyond his telegrams and his futile request to Mr. Wilson to arise. Agriculturists would seem to be under a double debt of gratitude to him. His final examination before the Committee really gave the deathblow to his own bill; and he now seems to have furnished a most valuable practical confirmation of the very arguments which they urged so strongly through their witnesses, on the Committee. It is a treat thing when the defendant's case can be proved out of the plaintiff's mouth.

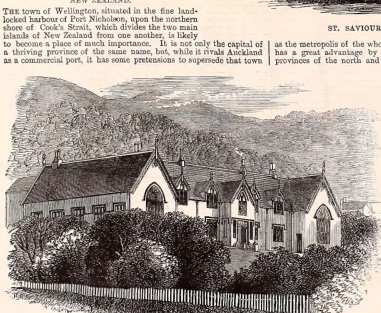
Tredegar concluded the store shows of the year in a very brilliant way. It is a new feature in shows that a horse like Ely should be brought out at the end of a season in which he has won upwards of £5000 for a ten-pound silver cup, which he took cleverly enough in a field of thirteen. Mr. Cartwright made up quite a family party with this elegant bay, his brother Llandaff, and his half brother and sister, the steeplechaser Penurth, and the rare old Fairwater. For the £30 hunter prize, whose jumping test of twelve or thirteen fences included a hedge and five yards of water, the Hon. F. C. Morgan's grey, ridden by himself, was successful. Mr. Duckham's promising young Hereford bull Commodore beat six shorthorns and three Herefords, one of them the celebrated Tambourine, for a ten-guinea cup; but a twenty-one-month shorthorn heifer, from Mr. Logan's Maindee herd, was preferred before him in the twenty-guinea cup trial for the best beast in the yard. It was a hum in the twenty-guinea cup trial for the best beast in the yard. It was a him in the twenty-guinea cup trial for the best beast in the yard. It was a hum in the twenty-guinea cup trial for the best beast in the yard. It was a hum in the twenty-guinea cup trial for the best beast in the yard. It was a hum

ST. SAVIOUR'S CHURCH, CLAPHAM.

THE new church in Cedars-road, Clapham-common, of which we give an Engraving, was built by the Rev. Wentworth Bowyer, Rector of Clapham, at a cost of about £10,000. The architect is Mr. James Knowles, jun. The style is Second Pointed. The building is cruciform in its length being 126 ft. and its width 58 ft.; while the length of the transepts is 77 ft. It has a large central tower, 120 ft. high and 20 ft. square. The whole is built of Kentish rag with Bath stone dressings, the interior piers being of Portland stone. The stained-glass windows are by Messrs. Clayton and Bell. In this church, placed temporarily under the tower, is an altar-tomb, bearing on it a recumbent effigy of Mrs. Bowyer, cofoundress of the church, who died just before its completion. The carving of the tomb, the pulpit, and the font, which are all of stone, is very good, and the general effect of the interior is remarkably fine. Of the external appearance our Engraving gives a faithful representation.

ST. GILES'S CHURCH, DALLINGTON, SUSSEX.



THIS church, of which we give a view, has lately been rebuilt from the designs of Mr. Edward Habershon, the architect, and was consecrated by the Bishop of Chichester on the 15th of October. It consists of nave, north aisle, and chancel; the tower and spire, which are of the Tudor period, being left standing. The old church had fallen into a ruinous condition, and, from the slender resources of the inhabitants of the parish, it was most unlikely that they would be able, without extraneous help, to repair the neglect of past generations. Such help was, however, procured by the exertions of the Vicar, the Rev. R. R. Tatham, and at the cost of friends who knew the extreme necessity of the case. It is probable that a church has existed on this spot since the Norman conquest. It is situated on the crest of a hill, about seven miles west of Battle, and was originally placed in the midst of a forest, part of which still remains. The site is a commanding and beautiful one, embracing extensive views of the broad expanse of Pevensey Level, with the long line of blue sea beyond stretching from Beachy Head to the heights of Hastings and Fairlight on the left, and on the right with the noble range of South Downs sweeping on from Beachy Head to the Ditchling Beacon Downs to the west, with the lower ridges of the Weald between. The church which now stands on this beautiful spot is a very substantial and pretty structure.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS OF WELLINGTON, NEW ZEALAND.

THE town of Wellington, situated in the fine landlocked harbour of Port Nicholson, upon the northern shore of Cook's Strait, which divides the two main islands of New Zealand from one another, is likely to become a place of much importance. It is not only the capital of a thriving province of the same name, but, while it rivals Auckland as a commercial port, it has some pretensions to supersede that town as the metropolis of the whole colony, for which purpose Wellington has a great advantage by its central position among the several provinces of the north and the middle island. It has been selected by the Panama, New Zealand, and Australian Royal Mail Company as the port of arrival and departure for their ocean steamers; and it lies almost directly in the track of the homeward-bound vessels from Australia. The agricultural resources of Wellington have been largely increased by the purchase of the Ahuriri district, on the east coast, with the opening of the Wairarapa Valley, and the annexation of Manawatu, on the west coast, between Wellington and Wanganui. The Maori war has never disturbed the settlers in this province, as in those of Auckland and Taranaki or New Plymouth. The town of Wellington has a picturesque and commodious site on two level spaces, which form the west and south sides of the inner harbour. We present two views of its most conspicuous public buildings. The Supreme Court House, an edifice in the Ionic style, cost about £5,000. It contains the resident magistrate's court, and a hall, measuring 50 ft. by 25 ft., in which the Supreme Court holds its Sessions, both of civil and criminal jurisdiction. This Court House was formally opened for public business in September, 1863, by his Honour Mr. Justice Johnston, who is Judge of the provinces both of Wellington and Nelson. The building shown in our second Illustration is the Provincial Government House, erected in 1857, and calculated for the sittings of the Legislative Council and the General Legislative Assembly of New Zealand, as well as for those of the province of Wellington.

FINE ARTS.

THE Science and Art Department have issued an invitation for assistance in completing the collections in the South Kensington Museum, to which invitation we would contribute in giving publicity. The Department's desire to have the advantage of the advice and suggestions of the Institute of British Architects, the Architectural Museum, and the architectural profession, and lovers of art generally, whether at home or abroad, with regard to the reproduction of examples of architectural decoration. The objects specially referred to are—ornamental sculpture in marble, stone, or wood; wall decorations in painting, mosaic, &c.; ornamental pavements in mosaic, encaustic tiles, &c.; hammered and chased metal-work, and stained glass. It is desired that the objects selected for reproduction should be the finest of their classes, even in themselves, and not too large for exhibition. As examples of the kind of works required may be mentioned, what among those already obtained, casts of the Tomb of Archbishop Walter De Grey, York Minster; the Prior's Gateway, Norwich; the Singing-Gallery, Exeter; Giovanni Pisano's Pulpit, Pisa; and the Ghiberti Gates, Florence. It is further suggested that the finest typical works in stained glass, hammered iron, and mosaic might be reproduced in materials resembling the originals; other reproductions might be obtained by casting, electrotyping, or painting. In regard to Northern, Mediæval, and Renaissance art—of which the varieties of style are numerous—it would be desirable to form, in the first instance, a list of a few of the finest examples which illustrate each epoch and class of art. Lastly, it is proposed to make, in addition to the actual collections, general art-inventories, briefly naming the most remarkable objects and the localities where they may be inspected. We need not add that when the scheme here shadowed forth, and already worthily commenced at South Kensington, shall be fully and judiciously realised, the educational value of such collections will be inestimable. Everyone qualified to give advice, or in a position to render aid of any kind, should assist in this national work.

While speaking of the South Kensington collections of work, we should mention that the museum has lately acquired casts from the famous bronze bema, or Roman workmanship, in the Vatican, the door of the crypt of Wells Cathedral, remarkable for its beautiful ironwork; two original sinopies of the same place; the lantern which originally came from the abbey at Glastonbury, and has been preserved at Wells since the dissolution of the monasteries; the famous gold altar-frontal of the Cathedral d'Aix-la-Chapelle, as restored; and the very remarkable though little known sculptures, by Giovanni Pisano, on the pulpit of the cathedral at Pisa. We may add, also, that the following artists have undertaken to paint figures in continuation of the series in the arcade over the Lion Court of the museum—viz., Mr. Poynter, Phidias and Apelles; Mr. S. Hart, Masaccio; Mr. George; Mr. Dobson, Jean Goujon; and Mr. W. B. Scott, Peter Vischer. Messrs. Harland and Fisher are to execute one of the first-named figures in mosaic, with a gold ground.

The public works of demolition, edification, restoration, decoration, and general transformation go on merrily as ever in Paris. The whole of that portion of the great gallery of the Tuileries, which was built in the reign of Louis XIV., is demolished, and its reconstruction, in harmony with the work of Henry IV., will be commenced forthwith. The pavilion and wing of the same palace, which have been rebuilt, are now being crowned with elaborate ornaments in hammered lead, and the ornamental work of that part which abuts on the quay is being commenced. The new Tribunal of Commerce, between the Palais de Justice and Notre Dame, approaches completion. Four grand allegorical groups of sculpture are commissioned for the staircase; and the celebrated painter Robert Fleury is intrusted with the execution of four large works illustrative of Commerce for the decoration of the great hall. The restorations and additions connected with the courts of law and Prefecture of Police have been advanced with great activity, and the whole promises to be the most important work of the kind, after the Louvre and the Tuileries, executed in Paris for many years. But the most splendid and truly Imperial conception for the embellishment of Paris and the perpetuation of the memory of Napoleon III. is the proposed double row of statues from one extremity of Paris to the other, starting from the Place du Trône, traversing the boulevards and the Champs Elysée, and terminating at the Arc de l'Etoile! The statues, in marble or bronze, are to commemorate all who have been most celebrated in Monarchical, Republican, and Imperial France. As we have already remarked, London should have a line of statues on the new Thames way. A coup-d'œil may there be obtained longer and nobler than any even in Paris.

Mr. George Cruikshank's great allegorical picture, "The Worship of Bacchus," which was exhibited a year or two since, along with the most striking collection of his etchings, drawings, and book illustrations at Exeter Hall, has been engraved on steel, forming a plate of large size. The entire work of the engraving is done by Mr. Cruikshank himself; the finishing by Mr. Charles Mottram. Its design, as our readers are aware, is to expose the misdeeds and miseries of drunkenness by a panoramic view of an immense variety of crimes and disasters occasioned by that abominable vice. Without reference to the merits of the whole composition, we may remark that it shows undiminished vigour of imagination and graphic power. We cannot but respect, moreover, the genuine philanthropy which has induced this veteran artist, when, after toiling above sixty years for the public amusement, he has earned his fame and deserves the enjoyment of his repose, to execute so laborious a task for the sake of promoting that social and moral reform which is still so much needed among us.

BAROMETRICAL VARIATIONS OF THE LATE STORMS.

THE following remarks of James Glaisher, Esq., F.R.S., of the Royal Observatory, Greenwich, on the Barometrical Variations during the late storms, as shown in the annexed diagram, will be read with interest. He says:—

The reading of the barometer from the 1st of October to the 15th day was always high, and every day above its average, frequently to the amount of 0·3 in. and 0·4 in., and on the third day to 0·5 in. nearly. The direction of the wind till the eighth day was generally E. or E.N.E., and the greatest force of the wind during this interval was about 8 lb. on the square foot; but usually the air was in a gentle motion from the eastward. On the ninth day the force of the wind was N. and N.W., but at all times weak in strength. On the succeeding days, changed to the south-west, and the barometer readings descended below the average and declined (as is shown in the accompanying diagram) to 29·00 in. at 9 a.m. on the 15th, the minimum, on which day pressure to 9 lb. on the square foot took place. The reading of the barometer suddenly changed from 29·00 in. at 9 a.m. on the night of the day was 29·40 in., being a less than 0·09 in. increase in fifteen hours. It remained some time at this height, and then declined to 29·30 in. by 9 a.m. on the 22nd. From noon of the 22nd, the 23rd, its general tendency, as will be seen by the diagram, was increasing. It passed above the average on the 24th, having been fourteen days previously below, and at times, for twenty-four hours together, as much as three-quarters of an inch nearly. From the 23rd the course of the winds was from opposite quarters—viz., S.W. and N.E., but at all times light, and sometimes the air was almost free from motion. The barometer readings continued to increase, though with frequent slight falls, till Nov. 6, when the reading was as high as 30·40 in., or 1 lb. higher than on the 20th. On the succeeding day the reading began to decrease, and passed below its average on the 10th, it having been, on the same point from Oct. 20 for eleven days, a part of which time it was for twenty-four hours together more than six tenths of an inch in excess. During the thirteenth and fourteenth days the decrease was rapid, and the reading from noon on the 14th to nearly noon on the 15th varied only between 28·61 in. and 28·64. This latter reading corresponds to 13 lb. in eight days. At this time at Greenwich the greatest pressure we experienced was 31 lb. only; and it is very remarkable that, on the day of the reading of the barometer about London, there was scarcely any wind, whilst fearful storms were raging north of us. From the 15th and 16th of the barometer oscillated, but for the most part increased, and were 29·72 in. on the 19th, whilst the air was in gentle motion from the S.W. and W. Like changes followed, but decreasing readings were greater than increasing, till the reading of the barometer again was very low—viz., 29·73 in. at noon on the 28th, accompanied with S.W. wind, blowing with a pressure of 5 lb. on the square foot only. From this time the readings increased, and on the 30th passed above the average, having been below during eighteen days. It cannot fail to be remarked that at all times since the storms of the autumn was above its average, the wind has everywhere been moderate in strength, but that the period of our recent heavy gales has begun shortly after the reading has descended below the average; these gales have also been the worst when the barometer has been the least gradual, and thus of the weather had ceased only on the average again being approached.

"One fact can be learnt from these readings, and it is a very forcibly impressed upon the fishermen on the Northumberland coast when I first fixed the barometers there—that at no time, and particularly during the autumn months, should the warnings of the barometer pass unheeded; for although the barometer reading may be low, and, indeed, unusually so in these localities, without the storm passing over these places, yet they may feel certain that bad weather or gales of wind are at that very time, most likely, raging over the British Isles, and which might suddenly visit their localities (whether further west or south, as the diagram shows, or further east), and having come to us (see the diagram), no less than three times, a good deal below twenty-nine inches, yet no storm of any moment visited us; lent we have had and evidence of the fearful storm then raging on our northern and eastern coasts."

The Royal National Lifeboat Institution, by placing reliable barometers (made by Negretti and Zambra, and tested by myself at the Royal Observatory, Greenwich) around the coast, and close to the principal fishing ports, has not quite so much praise as when one of the storms of the autumn has been foretold, and the fishermen warned of its approach, but in affording timely steps to warn our fishermen from going into that sea in times of danger. Surely the public will not fail to appreciate fully the feelings which have prompted the committee of the institution to present as far as possible the necessary of having received the life-boat by timely warnings to those who otherwise might need its valuable and ever-ready services.

Lindsay, and Lieutenant-Colonel M'Leod of M'Leod have consented to act as trustees of the fund. The present honorary captains of the International Volunteer Eight—Captain H. E. Pellatt, 1860, Victoria, and Captain Mackenzie, 1st Rose-shire Administrative Battalion—have consented to act conjointly during their tenure of office as honorary secretaries of the association.

On Monday morning the members of the Queen's (Westminster) paraded at the Duke of York's Column, and, after blank ammunition had been served out, proceeded, accompanied by their band, to the Wellington Barracks ground, where the corps marched through the movements of a field-day, in the presence of a large number of spectators. The annual distribution of prizes will take place, in Westminster Hall, next Saturday.

The Right Hon. Mayor presided at a meeting of the Hampstead Rifles, at the Assembly Rooms, on Tuesday, when he presented the prizes won during the year to the successful competitors.

The prize-meeting of the sixth company of the St. George's, which has been delayed, has just been held at the ranges on Wormwood-scrubbs. On account of the bad weather the matches were limited to the members of No. 1 company and ten members of the 2nd Inland Revenue company of the Civil Service Corps. The match resulted in favour of the Victorias, they having scored 205 marks to 378 made by their opponents. The second match was between the corps and the 2nd Middlesex Administrative Battalion. After a good contest, the Victorias were declared the winners, they having scored 410 to 411 made by the 2nd Administrative Battalion. In the second and consolation prizes, open to all who had failed to secure a prize in the first, was then competed for, at 150 yards, with five rounds, the following prizes:—1, Private Tweet; 2, Private Weeks; 3, Private L. Jones; 4, Captain Whymper; 5, Private Thorpe; 6, Sergeant Pearman; 7, Private Bowman.

The members of the Victoria have shot off several matches during the present month. The last match was between the members of No. 1 company and ten members of the 2nd Inland Revenue company of the Civil Service Corps. The match resulted in favour of the Victorias, they having scored 205 marks to 378 made by their opponents. The second match was between the corps and the 2nd Middlesex Administrative Battalion. After a good contest, the Victorias were declared the winners, they having scored 410 to 411 made by the 2nd Administrative Battalion. In the second and consolation prizes, open to all who had failed to secure a prize in the first, was then competed for, at 150 yards, with five rounds, the following prizes:—1, Private Tweet; 2, Private Weeks; 3, Private L. Jones; 4, Captain Whymper; 5, Private Thorpe; 6, Sergeant Pearman; 7, Private Bowman.

The annual distribution of prizes to the 1st Middlesex Artillery Volunteers took place last week in the drill-shed at Hampstead, Leicester-square. Colonel Erskine officiated. Colonel Creed, the commanding officer of the brigade, opened the proceedings. He observed that the Middlesex Artillery Brigade during the past year had been present with its guns twice, viz., at Guildford, at Hyde Park; and twice Park Town; also at Wimbledon. At the last place they were under canvas, and were inspected by a Colonel of the Royal Artillery, who had spoken in the highest and greatest praise on the brigade for its efficiency. The numbers of the brigade were steadily increasing, and the prospects of efficiency was very much larger than last year. A school of arms had been established at the headquarters, and had been very beneficial. Colonel Erskine referred to the services of time, leisure, and pecuniary means made by the volunteers as a reason for their receiving both the moral and material support of the community they represented. He then handed the several prizes to the successful competitors, except the ladies' prize, which was presented by Mrs. Creed.

The December competition for the monthly challenge cup and for the all-comers' prize of the 4th Somerset (Taunton) corps came on Thursday week. Captain Wichham scored 41, winning the challenge cup. Mr. Ellis also made 41; but, having to allow two points for "any position" at the longer ranges, he score stood at 41, which gave Sergeant Dillwood had made. On shooting off, Mr. Ellis won.

On Monday the members of the 4th Administrative Brigade of London Artillery Volunteers, met for a competition for various prizes given by the officers, at Carr Wood range, near Preston. The first prize was won by Sergeant Bigby; second, Gunner Hurst; third, Battery Sergeant-Major Woolhouse; fourth, Bombadier Dickinson; fifth, Gunner Champion; sixth, Battery Sergeant-Major Topham; seventh, Sergeant Clarkson; eighth, Sergeant Mather; ninth, Corporal Woodhouse; tenth, Gunner Bassett. Prize for the best shooting with the rifle corps:—1, 200 yards—First, Gunner Harcourage; second, Battery Sergeant-Major Woodhouse. 200 yards—First, Corporal Woodhouse; second, Sergeant Bigby. 500 yards—First, Gunner Pye; second, Bombadier Dickinson.—On Monday next the Victoria Rifle Volunteers, who will muster 400 strong, under Colonel Fulwood Barracks, and twelve Staff Sergeants of the 3rd Royal Lancashire Militia, meet for competition at the rifle-range, near Longridge. The first prize was won by Colour-Sergeant Singleton, of the rifle corps; the second by Sergeant Downey; the third by Quartermaster Clarke; and the fourth, a prize added, by Private R. Fletcher. Afterwards, ten members of the Preston Rifle corps and a similar number of militia sergeants had a sweepstakes contest. The volunteers won the contest by 12 points.

Mr. Murray, of the Foreign Office, has recently met with an accident at Mr. Bore's seat, Aldermaston Court, and has in consequence of be injuries sustained, had to undergo the operation of having his left leg removed, the sight having been entirely destroyed.

On the 1st of December Mr. Justice Willes delivered the scale of progression for charging letters addressed to the United States of Columbia, or to any of the States of Central America, via Southampton, which, will be modified by substituting for the existing scale a scale of weight having half an ounce as a unit; the rates being calculated by single rates for each additional half ounce or fraction of half an ounce.

A letter from Vienna says. "The Rudolph Hospital has been formally inaugurated. Prince Felix Salm-Salm is dead of his wounds, and beautifully he went through the ceremony. It was his first official act (ever since July, 1864, he has been commandant of Vienna), and having signed his name in full, like a best-rate diplomatist. Of course all enjoyed the festival, and by expressing the wish that many more institutions like this, who were present, must have been to see their little son perform his first public duty."

The Débats publishes a letter from M. Feuillet de Conches, dated Cairo, 27th November, in which the author, who is known as a writer states that discovery has recently been made in the private library of Sultan Abdul-Aziz of a correspondence between Marie Caroline and her daughter, Marie-Annietette, from the marriage of the latter to the death of the Empress. There are twenty-four letters, of which the original of seven have been found, but the copies of the others are being fully authenticated. The letter dated 1792 is particularly curious. It was found by Count Equity Conservator of the Imperial Archives, is about to publish these letters.

A correspondent, writing from Victoria, Vancouver Island, on Oct. 8, states:—"We had a very lively shock of an earthquake a few days ago, quite as lively as the one experienced some years ago in Switzerland, only this, instead of being a morning sort of pendulum motion, was like the violent shaking of a railroad carriage to a train going at full speed. The windows of our house jingled as though they would break, and everything rattled fearfully. It was broad daylight, about seven in the morning, so all the people I talked to had been awakened by it, and were out in the streets in their night-clothes. Several outlying and some brick buildings were cracked, and a chimney was shaken down. They felt it also at the same time in New Westminster. It is said, plausibly, that simultaneously with the earthquake an immense portion of the summit of the crater of Mount Baker—a portion above a mile in circumference—fell in, and the appearance of the mountain is decidedly altered, even at the distance from which we see it, about seventy miles."

WILLS AND BEQUESTS.

The will of the Right Hon. Lady Arabella Alvanley, of Bruton-street, was proved in London by the executors, Richard William Pense, Esq., of Northallerton, and Charles Reynolds Williams, Esq., of Lincoln's-inn-fields. The personalty was sworn under £20,000. Lady Alvanley was the fifth daughter of the first Duke of Cleveland, K.G., and was married, in 1801, Richard, 3rd Lord Alvanley, who died in 1857 (title now extinct). The will is dated April, 1864, and her Ladyship died on the 20th of November. Her Ladyship has left legacies to her nephews, nieces, and others. To Mr. R. W. Peirse £1000, in addition to £500 left to each of her executors; and appointed her sister, Meyrick, the daughter of Colonel and Lady Meyrick, her residuary legatee, leaving to her also the personal part of the property given to her by Lord Alvanley had the power of disposition under a deed of the late Lady Amelia Powlett.

The will of the Rev. Sir William Marriott Smith-Marriott, Bart., M.A., of Headington-hill, Oxon, was proved under £35,000 personalty, the executors being the Rev. Hugh Forbes Smith-Marriott, the son; the Rev. Harris D. Davies; and George Hinds, Esq. The testator was appointed to the rectory of Hornsmeadow in 1825, of which living he was also patron. He died, on December 1, in the 84th year of his age, and was buried on the 7th inst. He leaves the advowson of the rectory of Hornsmeadow to his son Hugh Forbes; and to his son Harris D. Davies he bequeaths to his son Charles Reynolds, and to his eldest son, now Sir William Henry Smith-Marriott, Bart., he devises the real and personal property. He bequeaths £100 to the parochial district agency of £300, and a portion of the furniture. To his sons John and Hugh pecuniary legacies and bonds, after payment of his debts and legacies, he has appointed his three sons residuary legatees. The sum of £100 to charitable purposes, viz., the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts, Curates' Aid Society, Church Building Society, and the Kent Archæological Society, £20 each. Stamp duty.

The will of John Dakin Gaskell, Esq., of Highgate, was proved under £30,000 personalty. The trustees appointed are William Beaumont, Esq., of Warrington; Samuel Gaskell, Esq., one of the Commissioners in Lunacy; and George Hinds, Esq., of Lincoln's-inn-fields. The testator died in August last, having executed his will in 1859, and a codicil in July, 1864. He bequeaths pecuniary legacies to several, to the amount of £100, and to Mrs. Pike, wife of the Rev. Mr. W. Pike, whom he appoints guardian to such of his children as may be under age, the residue, he leaves a legacy of £300 and divides his estate equally amongst all his children.

The will of the late Edward Yates, Esq., of 30, Comptonterrace, Islington, has been proved. His personal property is sworn under £60,000. The executors are Mrs. Yates, one of the sole surviving trustees of the testator; and Dr. C. J. Hare, of Brook-street. After some legacies to Mrs. Yates and other relatives, the testator directs that the residue be applied to charitable purposes in left to University College, London, in trust, to apply one moiety of the interest thereof in the general purposes of the said College, and the other moiety to the Somerton Fund for the relief of poor patients. The residue of personal property is left to Dr. Hare.

On the night of the 22nd inst. the schooner Ida, of Dantzic, bound from that port to Dunkirk with steel, were on shore on Pulling Beach, Norfolk. It was blowing a gale of wind from the north-east at the time, with a heavy sea on. The crew, consisting of four life-boat of the National Institution, were all soon mustered; and with great difficulty, after having had to launch the life-boat more than once, succeeded in reaching the wreck and in taking off the shipwrecked crew, six in number. The cost of this life-boat and her carriage, together with a sum to provide for her future maintenance, amounting in all to £200, was presented to the National Life-boat Institution by the farm of Cuna and Company, Parsee merchants of Bombay, in acknowledgment of their success in business since their establishment in London, in 1853, and in testimony of the uniform kindness and courtesy which they had received from the inhabitants of the British metropolis.

LIFE-BOAT SERVICE.

THE Committee of the Royal National Life-boat Institution have received the following reports of the services rendered by the life-boats of the institution during the month of November:—

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS.

LORD WILLIAM FITZGERALD.

Lord William Charles O'Brien Fitzgerald was the younger son of William Robert, K.P., second Duke of Leinster, by his wife, Emilia Olivia, only daughter and heiress of St. George Usher, late Lord St. George, and was only brother and heir-presumptive of Augustus Frederick, P.C., present Duke of brother of that excellent nobleman, Augustus Frederick, P.C., present Duke of Leinster, born on June 4, 1791. His Lordship, who took a warm interest in Irish politics and held various an interesting and clever pamphlet entitled "Suggestions for the Future Government of Ireland," was High Sheriff of the County of Kildare in 1845. He was a most estimable companion, and county of Kildare in 1845. He was a most estimable companion, and was deservedly esteemed by a large circle of friends. Lord William was never married. He died on the 8th inst., at his town house, 7, Harcourt-terrace, Dublin.

SIR W. L. CALL, BART.

Sir William Berkeley Call, third Baronet, of Whiteford, in the county of Cornwall, who died at his town house, 25, Old Burlington-street, on the 22nd inst., was the eldest son of Sir William Pratt Call, the second Baronet, by his wife, Jane, daughter of George, fifth Earl of Granard, and was born on the 7th of May, 1810. He succeeded his father in the baronetcy Dec. 3, 1850. He was appointed Sheriff of Cornwall in 1852, and was a magistrate for the county and a Deputy-Lieutenant. He was for some time a Lieutenant of the South Hants Militia, and in 1854 he was High Sheriff of Cambridgeshire and Huntingdonshire in 1857, and was made, in 1858, a Commissioner for the Sewers of Sussex Rife Volunteers. He married, first, Dec. 31, 1840, Johanna Jane, youngest daughter of John Carstairs, Esq., of Stratford Green, Essex, and Woodhouse, Bucks, by whom (who died Feb. 2, 1856) he leaves two sons and two daughters. He married, secondly, Nov. 13, 1862, Mary Elizabeth, third daughter of the Rev. Frederick Vincent, Prebendary of Chichester and Rector of Stanfold, Sussex, by whom (who survives him) he leaves also issue—viz., three sons and a daughter. The heavens also issue—viz., three sons and a daughter. The eldest son is now Henry Curstairs Peiy, the third Baronet, who was born April 25, 1844. This family has been of known importance for nearly two hundred centuries. On July 6, 1846, its then head and representative, John Henry Peiy, Governor of the Hudson's Bay Company, Deputy-Lieutenant of the Tower, and some time Governor of the Bank of England, was created a Baronet. He was father of the deceased Baronet.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE TURNER.

General Sir George Turner, K.C.B., Colonel-Commandant Royal Artillery, who died on the 8th inst., at his native place, Perth, North Britain, Aberdeenshire, was the eldest son of Robert Turner, Esq., of Menie, by his wife, Euphemia, daughter of George Simpson, Esq. He was born in 1780, and, after receiving his early education at Aberdeen, proceeded to Woolwich, and, on passing through the usual course at the Military Academy, he obtained his commission as Second Lieutenant in the Royal Artillery in January, 1798. He subsequently served and distinguished himself in the war of the capture of the Cape of Good Hope, in 1806. He joined the Army under the late Lord Lake, in India, in 1808, and commanded the Horse Artillery in the war until the end of the war. He was at the Battles of Orthes and Toulouse, and at the affair at Vic Bigorre, and subsequently received the gold medal and clasp for the two former. In 1831 he was made a C.B., and in 1862 a K.C.B. Sir George Turner, K.C.B., has been Colonel-Commandant of the 13th Regt. Royal Artillery. Turner became a Major-General in 1851, a Lieutenant-General in 1854, and a General in 1863.

LIEUTENANT-COLONEL SOWERBY.

Lieutenant-Colonel Thomas Sowerby, J.P., of Putteridge Bury, Herts, whose death has just occurred, was the eldest son representative of a highly respectable Hertfordshire family, and was one of the few surviving heroes of Waterloo. He entered the Navy, and in Sir Sydney Smith's Syrian Campaign of 1799, 1800, and, embarking at Ramsgate in 1808, went through nearly the whole of the Peninsular War. He was at the passage of the Douro, the taking of Oporto, and the affair at Salamonde; the Battles of Talavera, Salamanca, Vittoria, the Nive, and the Nivelle. He was with the covering army during the siege of Badajos, and at the siege of Burgos, and the sortie at Bayonne. He returned to England with the regiment in 1814, was sent out to Brussels in 1815, and was at the battle of Waterloo. He had received the war medal and clasp for the battles of the Nivelle, Vittoria, Salamanca, and Talavera, and the medal for Waterloo. Sowerby became a Lieutenant-Colonel in 1837.

THE HON. A. E. PRENDERGAST VEREKER.

The Hon. Adolphus Edward Prendergast Vereker, whose premature and lamented death, in the midst of a very promising career, as a captain of marines, at Yokohama, Japan, on the 26th of last October, was the sixth and youngest son of John Prendergast, fifth Viscount Gort, by Elizabeth, his first wife, Maria, eldest daughter of Standish, first Viscount Guillamore. He was born in 1832; and, having entered the British Navy, he received distinguished himself as an officer of the 97th Foot in the Crimean War. He had been made a supernumerary of that regiment in 1855, and became a Captain of it in 1860. He was never married.

H. H. LEATHES, ESQ.

Henry Maxwelden Leathes, Esq., of Herringfleet Hall, in the county of Suffolk, whose lamented death occurred on the 16th inst., at Lowestoft, was formerly in the Army and Navy Service, and served in the Peninsula and Waterloo campaigns, being wounded at the Battle of Corunna. His kindness of heart and unbounded charity made him universally esteemed, and for only last year, in appreciation of the services he had so long rendered to humanity, the Imperial Majesty the Emperor of Russia, Alexander II., conveyed to him, by the Commodore and several officers of the northern French squadron, the gold medal of honour, which was presented by Admiral Mussendon, of which Mr Leathes was the male representative, came over from Normandy, where, in the early part of the last century, he settled in the position that Sir William de Mussendon held the dignified office of Grand Admiral of England. A.D. 1110. Mr. Leathes was a most liberal supporter, dedicated it to the blessed Virgin, in fulfilment of a vow made during a dangerous storm at sea, in which the whole fleet except the Admiral's vessel was wrecked, and the Admiral himself only escaped by the most imminent danger. From this ancient house lineally descended Catherine, wife of William, M.P. for Dunwich, who was created a Baronet by Charles II., 1660. Henry Leathes, Esq., Minister Plenipotentiary at Stuttgart, married Lucy, daughter of Lord Henry Howard, and had Henry Leathes, Esq. (Major 1st Royal Lancashire Militia), Charles Leathes, Esq., M.A. (Fellow of Caius College, Cambridge), and Rev. Stanley Leathes, Esq., M.A., Professor of Hebrew and Rector of the parish of St. Botolph, Bishopsgate. The late Mr. Leathes was the eldest son of his brother, John Francis Leathes, Esq., of Herringfleet Hall, Suffolk, and Lucas-street, Commissioner of Taxes, Esq., of Gunton
